

GOVERNMENT OF INDIA
ARCHÆOLOGICAL SURVEY OF INDIA
ARCHÆOLOGICAL LIBRARY

ACCESSION NO. 13363

CALL No. 937.06/Gib

D.G.A. 79

NOT TO BE

THE

HISTORY

OF THE

DECLINE AND FALL

OF THE

ROMAN EMPIRE.

By EDWARD GIBBON, Esq.

13367

123 1

IN TWELVE VOLUMES.

VOL. III.

A NEW EDITION.

937.06

Gib

EDINBURGH:

PRINTED FOR BELL AND BRADSHAW, STERLING HILL, SILVERSTEIN DOUGLASS, AND A. KESSELMAN, AND JOHN OGDEN.

1811.

(29)

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL LIBRARY, NEW DELHI

Acc. No. 13367

Date 23.6.1962

Call No. 937.06 vol (13)

Gile

CONTENTS

OF THE

THIRD VOLUME.

CHAP. XVII.

Foundation of Constantinople.—Political system of Constantine, and his successors.—Military discipline.—The palace.—The finances.

A. D.		Page
324	DAUON of a new capital, - - -	2
	Situation of Byzantium, - - -	3
	Description of Constantinople, - - -	4
	The Bosphorus, - - -	ib.
	The part of Constantinople, - - -	7
	The Propontis, - - -	8
	The Hellespont, - - -	9
	Advantages of Constantinople, - - -	12
	Foundation of the city, - - -	13
	Its extent, - - -	15
	Progress of the work, - - -	18
	Edifices, - - -	20
	Population, - - -	24
	Privileges, - - -	25
330 or 334.	Dedication, - - -	28
300-500.	Form of government in the Roman Empire, - - -	30
	Hierarchy of the state, - - -	31
	Three ranks of honour, - - -	34
	Four divisions of office, - - -	ib.
	I. The consuls, - - -	35
	The patricians, - - -	39

A. D.		Page
	II. The pretorian prefects, - -	42
	The prefects of Rome and Constantinople,	43
	The procurators, vico-prefects, &c.	48
	The governors of the provinces, -	50
	The profession of the law, -	53
	III. The military officers, -	56
	Distinction of the troops, -	59
	Reduction of the legions, -	62
	Difficulty of levies, -	64
	Encrease of barbarian auxiliaries,	66
	V. Seven ministers of the palace, -	68
	1. The chamberlain, - -	69
	2. The master of the offices, -	70
	3. The questor, -	71
	4. The public treasurer, -	74
	5. The private treasurer,	75
	6, 7. The counts of the domestics,	77
	Agents, or official spies, - -	78
	Use of torture, - - -	79
	Finances, - - -	81
	The general tribute, or indiction, -	83
	Assessed in the form of a capitation,	87
	Capitation on trade and industry, -	94
	Free gifts, - - -	95
	Conclusion, - - -	97

CHAP. XVIII.

Character of Constantine. Gothic war.—Death of Constantine.—Division of the empire among his three sons.—Persian war.—Tragic death of Constantine the younger, and Constans.—Usurpation of Magnentius.—Civil war. Victory of Constantine.

A. D.		Page
	Character of Constantine,	99
	His virtues, - - -	100
	His vices, - - -	102
	His family, - - -	104
	Virtues of Crispus, - - -	106
324	Jealousy of Constantine, - -	108

CONTENTS.

A. D.	Page
323 Edict of Constantine,	109
326 Disgrace and death of Crispus,	110
The empress Fausta,	112
The sons and nephews of Constantine,	115
Their education,	116
Manners of the Sarmatians,	119
Their settlement near the Danube,	121
331 The Gothic war,	123
334 Expulsion of the Sarmatians,	126
337 Death and funeral of Constantine,	127
Factions of the court,	129
Massacre of the princes,	131
337 Division of the empire,	133
340 Sapor, king of Persia,	134
State of Mesopotamia and Armenia,	136
342 Death of Tridates,	137
337-360. The Persian war,	139
348 Battle of Slageta,	140
338, 346, 350. Siege of Nisibis,	142
340 Civil war and death of Constantine,	145
350 Murder of Constantine,	147
Magenentius and Vetranio assume the purple,	149
Constantine refuses to treat,	151
Deposes Vetranio,	153
351 Makes war against Magentius,	155
Battle of Mursa,	159
352 Conquest of Italy,	162
353 Last defeat and death of Magentius,	164

CHAP. XIX.

*Constantine sole emperor.—Elevation and death of Gallus.
—Danger and elevation of Julian.—Sarmatian and Persian wars.—Victories of Julian in Gaul.*

A. D.	Page
Power of the eunuchs,	169
Education of Gallus and Julian,	171
351 Gallus declared Cæsar,	172
Cruelty and impudence of Gallus,	173
354 Massacre of the imperial ministers,	175
Dangerous situation of Gallus,	176

A. D.		Page
	His disgrace and death, - - -	179
	The danger and escape of Julian, - -	181
355	He is sent to Athens, - - -	183
	Recalled to Milan, - - -	184
	Declared Cæsar, - - -	188
	Fatal end of Sylvanus, - - -	190
357	Constantine visits Rome, - - -	191
	A new obelisk, - - -	194
357, 358, 359.	The Quadian and Sarmatian war, -	195
358	The Persia negotiation, - - -	200
359	Invasion of Mesopotamia by Sapor, -	204
	Siege of Amida, - - -	206
360	Siege of Singara, - - -	209
	Conduct of the Romans, - - -	211
	Invasion of Gaul by the Germans, -	213
	Conduct of Julian, - - -	215
356	His first campaign in Gaul, - - -	217
357	His second campaign, - - -	219
	Battle of Strasburg, - - -	221
358	Julian subdues the Franks, - - -	225
357, 358, 359.	Makes three expeditions beyond the Rhine,	228
	Restores the cities of Gaul, - - -	230
	Civil administration of Julian, - -	232
	Description of Paris, - - -	235

CHAP. XX.

The motives, progress, and effects of the conversion of Constantine.—Legal establishment of the Christian, or Catholic church.

A. D.		Page
306-317.	Date of the conversion of Constantine,	238
	His pagan superstition, - - -	242
306-312.	He protects the Christians of Gaul, -	243
313	Edict of Milan, - - -	244
	Use and beauty of the Christian morality, -	246
	Theory and practice of passive obedience,	248
	Divine right of Constantine, - - -	250
324	General edict of toleration, - - -	252
	Loyalty and zeal of the Christian party,	253

A. D.	Page
Expectation and belief of a miracle, -	255
I. The Laborum , or standard of the cross, -	256
II. The dream of Constantine, -	259
III. Appearance of a cross in the sky, -	263
The conversion of Constantine might be sincere, -	267
The fourth eclogue of Virgil, -	270
Devotion and privileges of Constantine, -	271
Delay of his baptism till the approach of death, -	272
Propagation of Christianity, -	275
312-438. Change of the national religion, -	280
Distinction of the spiritual and temporal powers, -	281
State of the bishops under the Christian emperors, -	283
I. Election of bishops, -	284
II. Ordination of the clergy, -	287
III. Property, -	290
IV. Civil jurisdiction, -	295
V. Spiritual censures, -	297
VI. Freedom of public preaching, -	300
VII. Privilege of legislative assemblies, -	303

CHAP. XXI.

Persecution of heresy.—The schism of the Donatists.—The Arian controversy.—Athanasius.—Distressed state of the church and empire under Constantine and his sons.—Toleration of Paganism.

A. D.	Page
312 African controversy, -	309
315 Schism of the Donatists, -	311
The Trinitarian controversy, -	314
A. C.
360 The system of Plato, -	ib.
The Logos, -	315
390 Taught in the school of Alexandria, -	ib.
A. D.
97 Revealed by the apostle St. John, -	317
The Ebionites and Docetes, -	319
Mysterious nature of the trinity, -	320
Zeal of the Christians, -	322
Authority of the church, -	326

A.D.		Page
	Faction,	327
318	Heterodox opinions of Arius,	328
	Three systems of the trinity ,	329
	I. Arianism,	ib.
	II. Trithemism,	330
	III. Sabellianism,	331
325	Council of Nice,	332
	The Homoeousion,	335
	Arian creeds,	336
	Arian texts,	338
	Faith of the Western, or Latin, church,	342
330	Council of Rimini,	343
	Conduct of the emperor in the Arian controversy,	344
334	Indifference of Constantine,	345
335	His exile,	346
335-337.	He persecutes the Arian and the orthodox party,	347
337-361.	Constantine favours the Arians,	350
	Arian councils,	352
	Character and adventures of Athanasius,	355
339	Persecution against Athanasius,	359
340	His first exile,	363
341	His second exile,	ib.
349	His restoration,	367
351	Re-entrance of Constantine,	370
352-355.	Councils of Arles and Milan,	371
355	Condemnation of Athanasius,	374
	Exiles,	375
359	Third expulsion of Athanasius from Alexandria,	378
	His behaviour,	381
356-361.	His retreat,	383
	Arian bishops,	387
	Divisions,	388
	I. Rome,	390
	II. Constantinople,	392
	Cruelty of the Arians,	396
343, &c.	The revolt and fury of the Donatist Circum-
	cellions,	398
	Their religious suicides,	401
312-361.	General character of the Christian sects,	403
	Tolerance of paganism by Constantine,	404
	By his sons,	407

DECLINE AND FALL
OF THE
ROMAN EMPIRE.

CHAP. XVII.

Foundation of Constantinople—Political system of Constantine, and his successors—Military discipline—The palace—The finances.

THIS unfortunate Licinius was the last rival who opposed the greatness, and the last captive who adorned the triumph, of Constantine. After a tranquil and prosperous reign, the conqueror bequeathed to his family the inheritance of the Roman empire; a new capital, a new policy, and a new religion; and the innovations which he established have been embraced and consecrated by succeeding generations. The age of the great Constantine and his sons is filled with important events; but the historian must be oppressed by their number and

CHAP.
XVII.

CHAP.
XVII.

CONTINUED.

variety, unless he diligently separates from each other the scenes which are connected only by the order of time. He will describe the political institutions that gave strength and stability to the empire, before he proceeds to relate the wars and revolutions which hastened its decline. He will adopt the division unknown to the ancients, of civil and ecclesiastical affairs: the victory of the Christians, and their intestine discord, will supply copious and distinct materials both for edification and for scandal.

Design of the book continued.

A. D. 324.

After the defeat and abdication of Licinius, his victorious rival proceeded to lay the foundations of a city, destined to reign, in future times, the mistress of the East, and to survive the empire and religion of Constantine. The motives, whether of pride or of policy, which first induced Diocletian to withdraw himself from the ancient seat of government, had acquired additional weight by the example of his successors, and the habits of forty years. Rome was insensibly confounded with the dependent kingdoms which had once acknowledged her supremacy: and the country of the Cæsars was viewed with cold indifference by a martial prince, born in the neighbourhood of the Danube, educated in the courts and armies of Asia, and invested with the purple by the legions of Britain. The Italians, who had received Constantine as their deliverer, submissively obeyed the edicts which he sometimes condescended to address to the senate and people of Rome; but they were seldom honoured with the presence of their new sovereign. During the vigour of his age, Constantine, according to the various exigencies of peace and war, moved with slow dignity, or with active diligence, along the frontiers of his extensive dominions; and was always prepared to take the field either against a foreign or a domestic enemy. But as he gradually reached the summit of prosperity and the decline of life, he began to meditate the design of fixing in a more permanent station the strength as well as majesty of the throne. In the choice of an advantageous situation, he preferred the confines of Europe and Asia; to curb, with a powerful arm, the barbarians who dwelt between the Danube and the Taurus; to watch with an eye of jealousy the conduct of the Persian monarch, who indignantly supported the yoke of an ignominious treaty. With these views, Diocletian had selected and embellished the residence of Nicomedia; but the memory of Diocletian was justly abhorred by the protector of the church; and Constantine was not insensible to the ambition of founding a city which might perpetuate the glory of his own name. During the late operations of the war against Licinius, he had sufficient opportunity to contemplate, both as a soldier and as a statesman, the incomparable position of Byzantium; and to observe how strongly it was guarded by nature against an hostile attack, whilst it was accessible on every side to the benefits of commercial intercourse. Many ages before Constantine, one of the most judicious historians of antiqui-

Situation of Byzantium

CHAP.
XVII.

ty* had described the advantages of a situation, from whence a feeble colony of Greeks derived the command of the sea, and the honours of a flourishing and independent republic.⁵

Description of Constanti-
nople.

If we survey Byzantium in the extent which it acquired with the august name of Constantinople, the figure of the imperial city may be represented under that of an unequal triangle. The obtuse point, which advances towards the east and the shores of Asia, meets and repels the waves of the Thracian Bosphorus. The northern side of the city is bounded by the harbour; and the southern is washed by the Propontis, or sea of Marmara. The basis of the triangle is opposed to the west, and terminates the continent of Europe. But the admirable form and division of the circumjacent land and water cannot, without a more ample explanation, be clearly or sufficiently understood.

The Bos-phorus.

The winding channel through which the waters of the Euxine flow with a rapid and incessant course towards the Mediterranean, received the appellation of Bosphorus, a name not less celebrated in the history, than in the fables of antiquity.* A crowd of temples and of votive altars profusely scattered along its steep and woody banks, attested the unskillfulness, the terrors, and the devotion of the Grecian navigators, who, after the example of the Argonauts, explored the dangers of the inhospitable Euxine. On these banks tradition long preserved the memory of the palace of Phineus, infested by the obscene harpies;† and of the sylvan reign of Amycus, who defied the son of Leda to the combat of the Cestus.‡ The streights of the Bosphorus are terminated by the Cynneum rocks, which, according to the description of the poets, had once floated on the face of the waters: and were destined by the gods to protect the entrance of the Euxine against the eye of profane curiosity! From the Cynnean rocks to the point and harbour of Byzantium, the

* Polybius, l. iv. p. 372. edit. Cousin. He observes that the peace of the Byzantines was frequently disturbed, and the extent of their territory contracted, by the invasions of the wild Thracians.

⁵ The navigator Dyon, who was visited the son of Neptune, founded the city 646 years before the Christian æra. His followers were drawn from Argos and Megara. Byzantium was afterwards rebuilt and fortified by the Spartan general Pamanius. See Scaliger Animadv. ad Strab. p. 81. Thuringe Constantinopolis, l. i. par. 7. cap. 13, 16. While engaged in the wars of the Byzantines against Philip, the Gauls, and the Kings of Bithynia, we should remember that the ancient colonies who lived before the greatness of the imperial city had excited a spirit of jealousy and sedition.

* The Bosphorus has been very minutely described by Diodorus at Byzantium, who lived in the time of Domitian (Hædæus Geograph. Minut. tom. 22), and by Gyllius de Gyllis, a French traveller of the sixteenth century. Tavernier (Lettre 47) seems to have used his own eyes and the learning of Gyllis.

† There are very few conjectures so happy as that of Le Clerc (Bibliothèque Universelle, tom. 4. p. 186), who supposes that the harpies were only locusts. The Syrian or Phœnician name of those insects, their noisy flight, the stench and devastation which they occasion, and the north wind which drives them into the sea, all contribute to form this striking resemblance.

‡ The residence of Amycus was in Asia, between the old and the new Pontus, at a place called Lemnæ Infera. That of Phineus was in Europe, near the village of Mædromæ and the Black sea. See Gyllius de Bosph. l. 2. c. 23. Tavernier, Lettre 27.

§ The description was surrounded by several painted rocks, alternately raised and plunged by the waves. At present there are two small islands, one towards either shore: that of Eagle is the signified by the entrance of Potamys.

CHAP.
XVII.

winding length of the Bosphorus extends about sixteen miles,* and its most ordinary breadth may be computed at about one mile and a half. The new castles of Europe and Asia are constructed, on either continent, upon the foundations of two celebrated temples, of Serapis and of Jupiter Urius. The old castles, a work of the Greek emperors, command the narrowest part of the channel, in a place where the opposite banks advance within five hundred paces of each other. These fortresses were restored and strengthened by Mahomet the Second, when he meditated the siege of Constantinople; but the Turkish conqueror was most probably ignorant, that near two thousand years before his reign, Darius had chosen the same situation to connect the two continents by a bridge of boats.[†] At a small distance from the old castles we discover the little town of Chrysopolis, or Scutari, which may almost be considered as the Asiatic suburb of Constantinople. The Bosphorus, as it begins to open into the Propontis, passes between Byzantium and Chalcedon. The latter of these cities was built by the Greeks,

* The ancients computed six hundred and twenty stadia, or fifteen Roman miles. They measured only from the new castles, but they carried the straight line as far as the tower of Chalcedon.

† Diod. Hist. v. 54. Leontides Hist. Poen. Mithridaticæ, l. iv, p. 575. Under the Greek empire these vessels were used as state prisons, under the immediate name of Leptæ, or towers of Chrysopolis.

‡ Hæc enim signum est claustræ, et Angliæ interea in tres gentes scissæ, the names of his subject nations, and the naming names of his land and sea forces. The Pyrronians afterwards transported these columns into Sicily, and used them for the altars of their tutelæ deities. Herodotus, l. iv, c. 87.

a few years before the famine; and the blindness of its founders, who overlooked the superior advantages of the opposite coast, has been stigmatised by a proverbial expression of contempt.¹ CHAP. XVII.

The harbour of Constantinople, which may be considered as an arm of the Bosphorus, obtained, in a very remote period, the denomination of the Golden Horn. The curve which it describes might be compared to the horn of a stag, or as it should seem, with more propriety, to that of an ox.² The epithet of golden was expressive of the riches which every wind wafted from the most distant countries into the secure and capacious port of Constantinople. The river Lycus, formed by the conflux of two little streams, pours into the harbour a perpetual supply of fresh water, which serves to cleanse the bottom, and to invite the periodical shoals of fish to seek their retreat in that convenient recess. As the vicissitudes of tides are scarcely felt in those seas, the constant depth of the harbour allows goods to be landed on the quays without the assistance of boats; and it has been observed, that in many places the largest vessels may rest their prows against the houses,

¹ Nemoque scilicet illis Bosphori Asiaticæ dædala Byætiæ in ætrem Europæ pænes Oceanum, Pythæon Apollinæ sanctuaria, illi medietatem æquæ, reddidit, æqualem uti, quædam, nullam, ceteris, nulli, æqualem. Et ambigua Chalcidæi mæchabætiæ, quæ pænes illi æquæ, pænes, hanc, nulli, æqualem legimus. Tacit. Annal. xii. 61.

² Strabo l. x. p. 495. Most of the names are not made off & on, to speak less figuratively; most of the names of the harbours are taken up. See Geogr. de Bosphori Thraciæ, l. i. c. 5.

CHAP.
XVII

while their sterns are floating in the water.* From the mouth of the Lycus to that of the harbour, this arm of the Bosphorus is more than seven miles in length. The entrance is about five hundred yards broad, and a strong chain could be occasionally drawn across it, to guard the port and city from the attack of an hostile navy.†

The Propontis.

Between the Bosphorus and the Hellespont, the shores of Europe and Asia receding on either side inclose the sea of Marmara, which was known to the ancients by the denomination of Propontis. The navigation from the issue of the Bosphorus to the entrance of the Hellespont is about one hundred and twenty miles. Those who steer their westward course through the middle of the Propontis, may at once descry the high lands of Thrace and Bithynia, and never lose sight of the lofty summit of Mount Olympus, covered with eternal snows.‡ They leave on the left a deep gulf, at the bottom of which Nicomedia was seated, the imperial residence of Diocletian; and

* Trajaneus de Bithynia, §. 1, c. 1. His description is confirmed by modern travellers. See Thevenot, part 1, l. 1, c. 15, Trajaneus, Lettre xii, Nabeck Voyage d'Asie, p. 72.

† See Huetange, c. 2, l. 1, part 1, c. 16, and his Observations sur Villahardouin, p. 285. The chain was drawn from the Acropolis, near the modern Kiosk, to the tower of Galatz, and was supported at convenient distances by large wooden poles.

‡ Thevenot (Voyage en Levant, part II, l. 1, c. 12) compares the mountains to 120 small Greek hills. Belin (Observations, l. 1, c. 1) gives a good description of the Propontis, but confuses himself with the vague expressions of one day and one night's sail. When Saundys (Travels, p. 38) talks of 180 leagues in length, as well as breadth, we can only suppose some mistake of the press, or the pen, of that tedious traveller.

they pass the small islands of Cyzicus and Proconnesus before they cast anchor at Gallipoli; where the sea, which separates Asia from Europe, is again contracted into a narrow channel.

The geographers who, with the most skillful accuracy, have surveyed the form and extent of the Hellespont, assign about sixty miles for the winding course, and about three miles for the ordinary breadth of these celebrated straits.^a But the narrowest part of the channel is found to the northward of the old Turkish castles between the cities of Cestus and Abydos. It was here that the adventurous Laender leaved the passage of the flood for the possession of his mistress.^b It was here likewise, in a place where the distance between the opposite banks cannot exceed five hundred paces, that Xerxes imposed a stupendous bridge of boats, for the purpose of transporting into Europe an hundred and seventy myriads of barbarians.^c A sea contracted within such nar-

^a See an admirable dissertation of M. d'Anville upon the Hellespont or Dardanelles, in the Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. xxviii, p. 316-344. Yet even this ingenious geographer is not fond of supposing 140, and perhaps tangential measures, for the purpose of rendering ancient writers as accurate as himself. The straits employed by Herodotus in the description of the Eufrates, the Bosphorus, &c. &c. &c. must undoubtedly be all of the same species; but it seems impossible to combine them either with truth or with each other.

^b The antique distance between Cestus and Abydos was three miles. The improbable tale of Hero and Laender is opposed by M. Michaud, but is defended on the authority of poets and medals by M. de la Nöue. See the Annales des Inscriptions, tom. vii., Hist. p. 74. Mém. p. 231.

^c See the seventh book of Herodotus, who has erected an elegant trophy to his own fame and to that of his country. The vessel ap-

CHAP.
XVII

row limits, may seem but ill to deserve the singular epithet of broad, which Homer, as well as Orpheus, has frequently bestowed on the Hellespont. But our ideas of greatness are of a relative nature: the traveller, and especially the poet, who sailed along the Hellespont, who pursued the windings of the stream, and contemplated the rural scenery, which appeared on every side to terminate the prospect, insensibly lost the remembrance of the sea: and his fancy painted those celebrated straits, with all the attributes of a mighty river flowing with a swift current, in the midst of a woody and inland country, and at length, through a wide mouth, discharging itself into the Ægean or Archipelago.* Ancient Troy, seated on an eminence at the foot of Mount Ida, overlooked the mouth of the Hellespont, which scarcely received an accession of waters from the tribute of those immortal rivulets the Simois and Scamander. The Grecian poets to have been crissé with fabulous accounts: but that truth, first of the Persians, and afterwards of the Greeks, was interested in tragedy the judgement and the critics. I should much doubt whether the readers have ever outdone the sea of any country which they described.

* See Wood's Observations on Homer, p. 220. I have, with pleasure, adopted this remark from an author, who in general seems to have disappointed the expectation of the public as a critic, and still more as a traveller. He had visited the banks of the Hellespont: he had read Hesiod; he ought to have consulted the Roman Geographers: how odd it would be for him to mention Rhodé and Alabanda! True Observations, p. 343, 344, even cities which were almost entirely distant from each other!

† Description of Scyros where many books on this story of Homer's catalogue. The waterish look of Strabo is sufficient for certainty.

CHAP.
XVII.

camp had stretched twelve miles along the shore from the Sigæan to the Rhætan promontory; and the flanks of the army were guarded by the bravest chiefs who fought under the banners of Agamemnon. The first of those promontories was occupied by Achilles with his invincible Myrmidons, and the dauntless Ajax pitched his tents on the other. After Ajax had fallen a sacrifice to his disappointed pride, and to the ingratitude of the Greeks, his sepulchre was erected on the ground where he had defended the navy against the rage of Jove and of Hector; and the citizens of the rising town of Rhætium celebrated his memory with divine honours.* Before Constantine gave a just preference to the situation of Byzantium, he had conceived the design of erecting the seat of empire on this celebrated spot, from whence the Romans derived their fabulous origin. The extensive plain which lies below ancient Troy, towards the Rhætan promontory and the tomb of Ajax, was first chosen for his new capital; and though the undertaking was soon relinquished, the stately remains of unfinished walls and towers attracted the notice of all who sailed through the straits of the Hellespont.†

* Stripes, l. 211, p. 213. The disposition of the ships, which were drawn upon dry land, and the plans of Ajax and Achilles, are very clearly described by Homer. See Iliad 13, 231.

¹ Florida, 2, p. 103. Seemann, 1, 2, 2. Thompson, p. 25. Geophila Callina, 1, 10, p. 45. Seemann, Ann., 1, 1, 10, p. 1. Seemann places the new city between Dona and Blanchell, but this apparent discrepancy may be corrected by the large error of his circumference. Before the foundation of Constantinople, Thrace

CHAP.
XVII.Advantages of Constantinople.

We are at present qualified to view the advantageous position of Constantinople, which appears to have been formed by nature for the centre and capital of a great monarchy. Situated in the forty-first degree of latitude, the imperial city commanded, from her seven hills,* the opposite shores of Europe and Asia; the climate was healthy and temperate, the soil fertile, the harbour secure and capacious, and the approach on the side of the continent was of small extent and easy defence. The Bosphorus and the Hellespont may be considered as the two gates of Constantinople; and the prince who possessed those important passages could always shut them against a naval enemy, and open them to the fleets of commerce. The preservation of the eastern provinces may, in some degree, be ascribed to the policy of Constantine; as the barbarians of the Euxine, who in the preceding age had poured their armaments into the heart of the Mediterranean, soon desisted from the exercise of piracy, and despaired of forcing this insurmountable barrier. When the gates of the Hellespont and Bosphorus were shut, the capital still enjoyed, within their spacious inclosure, every production which could supply the wants, or gratify the luxury, of Justin is mentioned by Calixtus the Pope, and Socrates by Zoroaster, as the intended apostle. They both suppose, with very little probability, that the emperor, if he had not been prevented by a prodigy, would have repeated the mistake of the Good Christians.

* Pausan's Description of the East, vol. II, part II, p. 117. His plan of the seven hills is clear and accurate. That traveller is seldom so satisfactory.

its numerous inhabitants. The sea coasts of Thrace and Bithynia, which languish under the weight of Turkish oppression, still exhibit a rich prospect of vineyards, of gardens, and of plentiful harvests; and the Propontis has ever been renowned for an inexhaustible store of the most exquisite fish, that are taken in their stated seasons, without skill, and almost without labour.² But when the passages of the straits were thrown open for trade, they alternately admitted the natural and artificial riches of the north and south, of the Ruxine and of the Mediterranean. Whatever rude commodities were collected in the forests of Germany and Scythia, as far as the sources of the Tanais and the Borysthenes; whatsoever was manufactured by the skill of Europe or Asia; the corn of Egypt, and the gums and spices of the farthest India, were brought by the varying winds into the port of Constantinople, which, for many ages, attracted the commerce of the ancient world.

The prospect of beauty, of safety, and of ^{prosperity} wealth, united in a single spot, was sufficient to justify the choice of Constantine. But as some decent mixture of prodigy and fable has, in every

* See Beins, Ostracodonta, p. 12-74. Among a variety of different species, the paludosa, is that of greatest value for this collection. We are here from Polynesia, Straits, and Japan, that the paludosa of the paludosa constituted the principal version of paludosa.

[illegible]

CHAP.
XVII.

age, been supposed to reflect a becoming majesty on the origin of great cities,* the emperor was desirous of ascribing his resolution, not so much to the uncertain counsels of human policy, as to the infallible and eternal decrees of divine wisdom. In one of his laws he has been careful to instruct posterity, that, in obedience to the commands of God, he laid the everlasting foundations of Constantinople;† and though he has not condescended to relate in what manner the celestial inspiration was communicated to his mind, the defect of his modest silence has been liberally supplied by the ingenuity of succeeding writers, who describe the nocturnal vision which appeared to the fancy of Constantine, as he slept within the walls of Byzantium. The tutelar genius of the city, a venerable matron sinking under the weight of years and infirmities, was suddenly transformed into a blooming maid, whom his own hands adorned with all the symbols of imperial greatness. The monarch awoke, interpreted the auspicious omen, and obeyed, without hesitation, the will of heaven. The day which gave birth to a city or colony was celebrated by the Romans with such ceremonies as had been ordained by a generous superstition ;* and though Constantine might omit some rites which savoured too strongly of their pagan origin, yet he was anxious to leave a deep impression of hope and respect on the minds of the spectators. On foot, with a lance in his hand, the emperor himself led the solemn procession, and directed the line, which was traced as the boundary of the destined capital: till the growing circumference was observed with astonishment by the assistants, who at length ventured to observe, that he had already exceeded the most ample measure of a great city. "I shall still advance," replied Constantine, "till I see the inviolable guide who marches before me, think proper to stop." Without presuming to investigate the nature or motives of this extraordinary conductor, we shall content ourselves with the more humble task of describing the extent and limits of Constantinople.¹

* Placet bene vixisse antiquitati, ut imperata bene esse dicenda, praesentia velis inquisitionem facere. T. Liv. in person.

† He says in one of his laws, per omnipotentis archi regis auctoritate, jubente Deo, constitutum. Code Theodose. l. xii. tit. iii. c. 1. §. 2.

‡ The Greeks, Theophrastus, Oribasius, and the authors of the Historia ecclesiastica, devote themselves to vague and general evocations. For a more particular account of the vision, we are obliged to have recourse to such Latin writers as William of Malmesbury.—See De scriptis v. c. l. pp. 22, 23.

In the actual state of the city, the palace and the gardens of the æræglio occupy the eastern promontory, the first of the seven hills, and cover

* See Plinius de Animal. lib. 1. p. 42. edit. Beyer. Among other ceremonies, a large lion, which had been dug for that purpose, was filled up with handfuls of earth, which each of the soldiers brought from the place of his birth, and thus adopted his new country.

* Philostorgius, l. ii. c. 3. This incident, though borrowed from a suspected writer, is characteristic and probable.

¹ See in the Mémoires de l'Académie, tom. xxvi. p. 717-739. a dissertation of M. d'Anville on the extent of Constantinople. He takes the place marked in the Imperium Orientis of Strabo as the most authentic; but, by a series of very nice observations, he reduces this extravagant proportion of six miles, and second of Strabo, determining the circumference of the city as consisting of about 7600 French paces.

CHAP.
XVII.

about one hundred and fifty acres of our own measure. The seat of Turkish jealousy and despotism is erected on the foundations of a Grecian republic; but it may be supposed that the Byzantines were tempted by the convenience of the harbour to extend their habitations on that side beyond the modern limits of the seraglio. The new walls of Constantine stretched from the port to the Propontis across the enlarged breadth of the triangle, at the distance of fifteen stadia from the ancient fortification; and with the city of Byzantium they inclosed five of the seven hills, which, to the eyes of those who approach Constantinople, appear to rise above each other in beautiful order.³ About a century after the death of the founder, the new building, extending on one side up the harbour, and on the other along the Propontis, already covered the narrow ridge of the sixth, and the broad summit of the seventh hill. The necessity of protecting those suburbs from the incessant inroads of the barbarians, engaged the younger Theodosius to surround his capital with an adequate and permanent enclosure of walls.⁴ From the eastern promontory to the golden gate, the extreme length of

³ Cronica Anonyma, Const. p. 12. He assigns the church of St. Gregory as the boundary on the side of the harbour. It is mentioned in Itinerary, l. iv. c. 8; but I have sought, without success, to discover the exact place where it was situated.

⁴ The new wall of Theodosius was reconstructed in the year 412. In 448 it was thrown down by an earthquake, and rebuilt by the diligence of the pasha Cyrus. The suburbs of the Blackmore Wall were taken into the city in the reign of Justinian. Barbarus, Geogr. l. i. c. 10, 11.

Constantinople was about three Roman miles; the circumference measured between ten and eleven; and the surface might be computed as equal to about two thousand English acres. It is impossible to justify the vain and credulous exaggerations of modern travellers, who have sometimes stretched the limits of Constantinople over the adjacent villages of the European, and even of the Asiatic coast.* But the suburbs of Pera and Galata, though situate beyond the harbour, may deserve to be considered as a part of the city;† and this addition may perhaps authorise the measure of a Byzantine historian, who assigns sixteen Greek (about fourteen Roman) miles for the circumference of his native city.‡ Such an extent may seem not unworthy of an imperial re-

* The measurement is expressed by the Vatican by 84,674 feet. It is reasonable to suppose that these were Greek feet; the proposition of which has been ingeniously determined by M. d'Anville. He compares the 180 feet with the 16 Hachemite cubits, which in different writers are assigned by the height of St. Sophia. Each of these cubits was equal to 27 French inches.

† The ancient Theodosius (C. L. c. 12) walked to the tower and three quarters round two of the sides of the citadel, (from the Rhodé of the struggle to the Seven Towers. D'Anville examined with care, and returned with evidence, that decisive testimony, which gives a diameter of 120 to twelve miles. The extravagant computation of Tournefort (Letter 10) of thirty miles, or thirty miles, without including Sicaria, is a strange departure from his usual character.

The walls, or squares, formed the third and fourth regions, and were very much embellished by Justinian. It has since borne the names of Pera and Galata. The etymology of the former is obvious; that of the latter is unknown. See Diarrhæa Constantinensis, l. i. c. 32, and Gyllius de Byzant. l. iv. c. 32.

‡ One hundred and above miles, which may be translated into modern Greek miles and of seven miles, or 600, sometimes only 500 French miles. See D'Anville Mesures Historiques, p. 33.

CHAP.

XVII.

Continued.

vidence. Yet Constantinople must yield to Babylon and Thebes,* to ancient Rome, to London, and even to Paris.[†]

Progress of the work.

The master of the Roman world, who aspired to erect an eternal monument of the glories of his reign, could employ in the prosecution of that great work the wealth, the labour, and all that yet remained of the genius of obedient millions. Some estimate may be formed of the expence bestowed with imperial liberality on the foundation of Constantinople, by the allowance of about two millions five hundred thousand pounds for the construction of the walls, the porticoes, and the aqueducts.[‡] The forests that overshadowed the shores of the Euxine, and the celebrated quarries of white marble in the little island of Proconnesus, supplied an inexhaustible stock of materials, ready to be conveyed, by the convenience of a short water-carriage, to the harbour of Byzantium.[§] A multitude of labourers and

* When the ancient texts, which describe the size of Babylon and Thebes, are applied, the exaggerations removed, and the measures ascertained, we find that these famous cities filled the area but not the extent of about two square miles thirty miles. Compare l'Année Mém. de l'Académie, ann. 1773, p. 525, with les Description d'Égypte, p. 101-102.

† If we divide Constantinople and Paris into equal spaces of 50 French leagues, the former contains 525, and the latter 1150 of those divisions.

‡ Six hundred talents, or six hundred thousand pounds weight of gold. Thésaurus is taken from Cassius Anagnin. Comet, p. 51: but admits that unscrupulous author, had desired his information from some pious woman, he would probably have been disappointed with an estimate a deal of reckoning.

§ For the forests of the Black sea, consult Tavernier, Lettes 176, for the marble quarries of Proconnesus, see Strabo, l. xiii, p. 266.

artificers urged the conclusion of the work with incessant toil: but the impatience of Constantine soon discovered, that, in the decline of the arts, the skill as well as numbers of his architects bore a very unequal proportion to the greatness of his designs. The magistrates of the most distant provinces were therefore directed to institute schools, to appoint professors, and by the hopes of rewards and privileges, to engage in the study and practice of architecture a sufficient number of ingenious youths, who had received a liberal education.* The buildings of the new city were executed by such artificers as the reign of Constantine could afford; but they were decorated by the hands of the most celebrated masters of the age of Pericles and Alexander. To revive the genius of Phidias and Lysippus, surpassed indeed the power of a Roman emperor; but the immortal productions which they had bequeathed to posterity were exposed without defence to the rapacious vanity of a despot. By his commands the cities of Greece and Asia were despoiled of their most valuable ornaments.† The trophies

CHAP.
XVIII

p. 208. The latter had already furnished the materials of the stately buildings of Cyrene.

* See the Code Théodosien, l. viii, tit. ix, leg. 1. This law is dated in the year 324, and was addressed to the prefect of Italy, whose jurisdiction extended over Africa. The commentary of Donatus on the whole title well deserves to be consulted.

† Constantine's dedicatio gave occasion to Marcellinus. Hieronymus, Clavis, p. 181. See Callens, p. 89. The author of the Antiquities, Conat, l. iii, report Constantine took Orient, l. i, p. 453 commentarius Blanc, Noty, Antiquis, Affrica, and a long list of other cities. The provinces of Greece and Asia Minor may be supposed to have yielded the richest booty.

CHAP.
XVII.

of memorable wars, the objects of religious veneration, the most finished statues of the gods and heroes, of the sages and poets, of ancient times, contributed to the splendid triumph of Constantinople; and gave occasion to the remark of the historian Cedrenus,* who observes, with some enthusiasm, that nothing seemed wanting except the souls of the illustrious men whom those admirable monuments were intended to represent. But it is not in the city of Constantine, nor in the declining period of an empire, when the human mind was depressed by civil and religious slavery, that we should seek for the souls of Homer and of Demosthenes.

EDINB.

During the siege of Byzantium, the conqueror had pitched his tent on the commanding eminence of the second hill. To perpetuate the memory of his success, he chose the same advantageous position for the principal forum;† which appears to have been of a circular, or rather elliptical form. The two opposite entrances formed triumphal arches; the porticoes, which enclosed it on every side, were filled with statues; and the centre of the forum was occupied by a lofty column, of which a mutilated fragment is now degraded by the appellation of the burial pillar. This column was erected on a pedestal of white

* Hist. Compend. p. 323. He discovers the statue, or rather bust, of Homer with a degree of veneration which proves that Cedrenus copied the style of a more distant age.

† Bohn, l. 2. p. 408. Euseb. Abbasetha in Pagiut, p. 284. Constance Compt. l. 1. c. 24. Even the last of these writers seems to confound the forum of Constantinople with the Augustæum, or court of the palace. I am not assured whether I have properly distinguished what belongs to the one and the other.

marble twenty feet high; and was composed of ten pieces of porphyry, each of which measured about ten feet in height, and about thirty-three in circumference.* On the summit of the pillar, above one hundred and twenty feet from the ground, stood the colossal statue of Apollo. It was of bronze, had been transported either from Athens, or from a town of Phrygia, and was supposed to be the work of Phidias. The artist had represented the god of day, or, as it was afterwards interpreted, the emperor Constantine himself, with a sceptre in his right hand, the globe of the world in his left, and a crown of rays glittering on his head.† The Circus, or Hippodrome, was a stately building, about four hundred paces in length, and one hundred in breadth.‡ The space between the two meta or goals was filled with statues and obelisks; and we may still remark a very singular fragment of antiquity; the bodies of three serpents, twisted into one pillar of brass. Their triple heads had once supported the golden tripod which, after the defeat of Xerxes, was consecrated in the temple of

* The most adequate account of this column is given by Pausanias, Description of the East, vol. II. part II. p. 134. But it is still in really immense perplexity and obscurity.

† Dureau la Ruelle, &c. v. II. p. 76, and his notes to Alcibiades, p. 281. The statue of Constantine as Apollo was thrown down under the reign of Alaric the Goth.

‡ Tacitus (Quæst. 10) computes the Stadium at four hundred paces. If he means geometrical paces of ten feet each, it was three hundred paces in length, about forty more than the great circus of Rome. See l'Asiatic Museum (London) p. 73.

CHAP.
XVII.

Delphi by the victorious Greeks.* The beauty of the Hippodrome has been long since defaced by the rude hands of the Turkish conquerors; but, under the similar appellation of Atmeidan, it still serves as a place of exercise for their horses. From the throne, whence the emperor viewed the Circensian games, a winding staircase^b descended to the palace: a magnificent edifice, which scarcely yielded to the residence of Rome itself; and which, together with the dependent courts, gardens, and porticoes, covered a considerable extent of ground upon the banks of the Propontis, between the Hippodrome and the church of St. Sophia.^c We might likewise cele-

* The grandeur of the most holy temple would vanish if they were able to produce with a chain of evidence, as may be alleged in this occasion. See Recherches de Antiquitez, Carte, p. 596. Olympic de Byzance, l. 8, v. 13. 1. The original construction of the temple and palace in the temple of Delphi may be proved from Herodotus and Pausanias. 2. The pagan Fasti agree with the Jews, excluding that historian, Eusebius, and Jerome, that the sacred ornaments of the temple of Delphi were removed to Constantinople by the order of Constantine; and among these the scepter, pillar of the Hippodrome is particularly mentioned. 3. All the European travellers who have visited Constantinople, from Wondolamere to Perrot, describe it in the same place, and almost in the same manner; the difference between them are measured only by the injuries which it has sustained from the Turks. Mémoires de l'Académie, the senior jaw of one of the scepters with a statue of his father-in-law, Théophrastus, l. 4, c. 17.

^a The Latin name audita was adopted by the Greeks, and very frequently occurs in the Byzantine history. Diogenes Comit. l. 14, c. 1, p. 164.

^b There are three topographical points which indicate the situation of the palace. 1. The staircase, which communicated it with the Hippodrome in Atmeidan. 2. A small artificial port on the Propontis, from whence there was an easy ascent, by a flight of marble steps, brate the baths, which still retained the name of Zeuxippus, after they had been enriched, by the munificence of Constantine, with lofty columns, various marbles, and above threescore statues of bronze.¹ But we should deviate from the design of this history, if we attempted minutely to describe the different buildings or quarters of the city. It may be sufficient to observe, that whatever could adorn the dignity of a great capital, or contribute to the benefit or pleasure of its numerous inhabitants, was contained within the walls of Constantinople. A particular description, composed about a century after its foundation, enumerates a capital or school of learning, a circus, two theatres, eight public, and one hundred and fifty-three private baths, fifty-two porticoes, five granaries, eight aqueducts or reservoirs of water, four spacious halls for the meetings of the senate or courts of justice, fourteen churches, fourteen palaces, and four thousand three hundred and eighty-eight houses, which, for their size or beauty, deserved to be to the gardens of the palace. B. The Augustæum was a spacious court, one side of which was occupied by the front of the palace, and another by the church of St. Sophia.

¹ Zeuxippus was an athlete of Epheirus, and the baths were a part of old Hyrcanæ. The discovery of painting their true situation has not been left to Chance. Having means to examine them with St. Sophia and the palace, but the adjacent plain, covered in thicket, placed them on the other side of the city, near the harbour. See their location, see Chron. Paroli, p. 184, and Olympe de Syon, t. II. s. 7. Chrysantheus de Antiquitat. Constantin. v. 10 inscribed inscriptions in verse for each of the statues. He was a Theban poet in Greek as well as in Latin.—

Remains in three pictures are missing.

CHAP. distinguished from the multitude of plebeian in-VIII. habitations.*

POPULOUS- The populousness of this favoured city was the ness. next and most serious object of the attention of its founder. In the dark ages which succeeded the translation of the empire, the remote and the immediate consequences of that memorable event were strangely confounded by the vanity of the Greeks, and the credulity of the Latins.† It was asserted and believed, that all the noble families of Rome, the senate, and the equestrian order, with their innumerable attendants, had followed their emperor to the banks of the Propontis; that a spurious race of strangers and plebeians was left to possess the solitude of the ancient capital; and that the lands of Italy, long since converted into gardens, were at once deprived of cultivation and inhabitants.‡ In the course of this history, such exaggerations will be reduced to their just

* See the Mithras. Rome only reckoned 1780 large houses, domos, but the word must have had a more dignified signification. No houses are reckoned at Constantinople. The old capital consisted of 455 streets, the new of 321.

† Enchiridion Legis ad Imp. Neoplatonem, p. 122. The modern Greeks have strangely distorted the antiquities of Constantinople. We might excuse the errors of the Turkish or Arabian writers; but it is somewhat surprising, that the Greeks, who had access to the authentic materials preserved in their own language, should prefer fiction to truth, and have tradition to genuine history. In a single page of Costans we may find twelve unperceivable mistakes; the promulgation of Severus and Niger, the marriage of their son and daughter, the siege of Byzantium by the Macedonians, the massacre of the Greeks which resulted Severus to Rome, the sixty years which elapsed from his death to the foundation of Constantinople, &c.

‡ Constantinople, Græcæ et Descriptio seu Roma, c. 25.

value. Yet, since the growth of Constantinople cannot be ascribed to the general increase of mankind and of industry, it must be admitted, that this artificial colony was raised at the expense of the ancient cities of the empire. Many opulent senators of Rome, and of the eastern provinces, were probably invited by Constantine to adopt for their country the fortunate spot which he had chosen for his own residence. The invitations of a master are scarcely to be distinguished from commands; and the liberality of the emperor obtained a ready and cheerful obedience. He bestowed on his favourites the palaces which he had built in the several quarters of the city, assigned them lands and pensions for the support of their dignity,¹ and alienated the demences of Pontus and Asia, to grant hereditary estates by the easy tenure of maintaining a house in the capital.² But these encouragements and obligations soon became superfluous, and were gradually abolished. Wherever the seat of government is fixed, a

¹ Thémist. Orat. iii. p. 48. Edic. Harlæan. Sextum, l. 9. c. 3. Zonarb. l. 12. p. 107. Anonym. Valensian. p. 712. If we could credit Odianus (Ep. 16), Constantine built houses for the senators on the exact model of those Roman palaces, and granted them, as well as himself, with the pleasure of an agreeable surprise, but the whole may be full of fiction and inconsistency.

² The law by which the emperor Theodosius, in the year 429, distributed this fund, may be found among the Novelle of that emperor at the head of the Theodosian Code, tit. xv. sect. 12. M. de Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iv. p. 211) has evidently mistaken the nature of these estates. With a year from the imperial donation, the same condition was accepted as a tenure which would justify him to demand a liability, if it had been imposed upon private property.

CHAP.
XVII.

considerable part of the public revenue will be expended by the prince himself, by his ministers, by the officers of justice, and by the domestics of the palace. The most wealthy of the provincials will be attracted by the powerful motives of interest and duty, of amusement and curiosity. A third and more numerous class of inhabitants will insensibly be formed, of servants, of artificers, and of merchants, who derive their subsistence from their own labour, and from the wants or luxury of the superior ranks. In less than a century, Constantinople disputed with Rome itself the pre-eminence of riches and numbers. New piles of buildings, crowded together with too little regard to health or convenience, scarcely allowed the intervals of narrow streets for the perpetual throng of men, of horses, and of carriages. The smallest space of ground was insufficient to contain the increasing people; and the additional foundations, which, on either side, were advanced into the sea, might alone have composed a very considerable city.*

Pensions

The frequent and regular distributions of wine and oil, of corn or bread, of money or provisions, had almost exempted the poorest citizens of Rome from the necessity of labour. The magnificence of the first Cæsars was in some measure imitated

* The passages of Zosimus, of Eusebius, of Hieronymus, and of Agathangus, which relate to the increase of buildings and inhabitants at Constantinople, are collected and connected by Gyllius de Byrant. P. 1, v. 1. Antiquit. Constantinensium (in Geograph. Antiquar. 22, p. 280, 481). Strabo also describes the roads that were pushed forwards till the sea; they consisted of the frons or Paradeisus (quay), which borders in the water.

by the founder of Constantinople¹ but his liberality, however it might excite the applause of the people, has incurred the censure of posterity. A nation of legislators and conquerors might assert their claim to the harvests of Africa, which had been purchased with their blood: and it was artfully contrived by Augustus, that, in the enjoyment of plenty, the Romans should lose the memory of freedom. But the prodigality of Constantine could not be excused by any consideration either of public or private interest; and the annual tribute of corn imposed upon Egypt for the benefit of his new capital, was applied to feed a lazy and indolent populace at the expence of the husbandmen of an industrious province.² Some other regulations of this emperor are less liable to blame, but they are less deserving of notice. He divided Constantinople into fourteen regions or quarters,³ dignified the public council with

¹ Epitome, l. ii. c. 2. Philosop. l. ii. c. 2. Cod. Theodos. l. i. c. 8. It appears by Socratus, l. ii. c. 13, that the early divisions of the city consisted of eight wards of area, which we may either translate with Valerius by the words modi of area, or consider as expressions of the number of houses of land.

² See Cod. Theodos. l. 30. and xvi. and Cod. Justinian. Edict. vii. c. 1. p. 438, edit. Græv. See the beautiful description of Rome in the poem of Flaminio de Bell. Italico, v. 46-54.

Constitutum per Romanorum, discursum parietem.

Aquæductus munitur teges; Egyptiæ sula

In portum convertitur æneæ.

³ The regions of Constantinople are mentioned in the code de Justinien, and particularly described in the Notitia of the younger Theodosius; but as the last list of them are not included within the wall of Constantinople, it may be doubted whether this division of the city should be referred to the founder.

CHAP.
XVII

the appellation of Senate,⁶ communicated to the citizens the privileges of Italy,⁷ and bestowed on the rising city the title of Colony, the first and most favoured daughter of ancient Rome. The venerable parent still maintained the legal and acknowledged supremacy, which was due to her age, to her dignity, and to the remembrance of her former greatness.⁸

Decline

Rev. A. D.

330 or 334.

As Constantine urged the progress of the work with the impetuosity of a lover, the walls, the porticoes, and the principal edifices, were completed in a few years, or, according to another account, in a few months;⁹ but this extraordinary dil-

⁶ Scipione constantinæ senatus sedesque sacra. Augustus Valentin. p. 115. The senators of old Rome were styled Comites. See a curious note of Valentin and Augustus. Maximian. vol. 2. From the directly effects of Julian, it should seem that the place of senator was considered as a hereditary rank than as an honour; but the Abbe de la Motte (Vie de Julien. tom. ii. p. 371) has shown that this opinion could not apply to Constantine. Might we not read instead of the hereditary name of Comites the obscure but more probable word Comitatus? Blasius or Blasinius, now Blasium, was a small mediterranean city of Thracia. See Stephan. Byz. de Urbibus, p. 124. and Keller. Geographicon. v. p. 394.

⁷ Ed. Theodoret. lib. 22. The commentary of Callistus (tom. vi. p. 200) is long, but perspicuous and useful as it may be essential in what the Big Bullion could contain, since the freedom of the city had been communicated to the whole empire.

⁸ Julian (lib. ii. p. 4) addresses Constantine, as not less superior to all other cities, than she was inferior to Rome itself. His learned commentator (Symmetus, ps. 12-16) justifies this language by several parallel and contemporary sentences. Severus, as well as Varianus and Valerianus, described after the division of the empire between the two sons of Theodosius, which established a perfect equality between the old and the new capital.

⁹ Callistus (Antiquitat. p. 9) affirms, that the foundation of Constantinople were laid in the year of the world 3307 (A. M. 330), on the 26th of September, and that the city was dedicated the 12th gence should excite the less admiration, since many of the buildings were finished in so hasty and imperfect a manner, that, under the succeeding reign, they were preserved with difficulty from impending ruin.* But while they displayed the vigour and freshness of youth, the founder prepared to celebrate the dedication of his city.† The games and largesses which crowned the pomp of this memorable festival may easily be supposed; but there is one circumstance of a more singular and permanent nature, which ought not entirely to be overlooked. — As often as the birth-day of the city returned, the statue of Constantine, framed by his order, of gilt wood, and bearing in its right hand a small image of the genius of the place, was erected on a triumphal car. The guards, carrying white tapers, and clothed in their richest apparel, accompanied the solemn procession as it moved through the Hippodrome:

of May 24th (i. e. 333). Its contents draw dates with several characteristic epistles, and they correspond each other; the authority of Collins is of little weight; and the years which its authors could appear insufficient. The term of one year is given us by Julius (Olyn. i. p. 9), and Spoudaios labours to establish the truth of it (p. 68-70); by the help of two passages from Theophrastus (Hist. iv. p. 66) and Philodamus (l. ii. c. 11), which form a period from the year 218 to the year 224. Modern critics are divided concerning this point of chronology; and their different conclusions are very ably and judiciously discussed by Tiffney, Hart, and Thompson, ibid. iv. p. 619-625.

* Theophrastus, l. c. iii. p. 47. Strabo, l. vi. p. 168. Commodus and Septimius, in one of his laws (l. c. Thes. l. xv. c. 1), testify his impatience.

† Calpurnia and Zonara, besides the usual of supposing the statue prevailed in Italy as a statue, found in fact Constantinople was consecrated to the virgin Mother of God.

CHAP. XVII. When it was opposite to the throne of the reigning emperor, he rose from his seat, and with grateful reverence adored the memory of his predecessor.* At the festival of his dedication, an edict, engraved on a column of marble, bestowed the title of Second or New Rome on the city of Constantine.* But the name of Constantinople* has prevailed over that honourable epithet; and after the revolution of fourteen centuries, still perpetuates the fame of its author.*

The foundation of a new capital is naturally connected with the establishment of a new form of civil and military administration. The distinct view of the complicated system of policy, introduced by Diocletian, improved by Constantine,

* The earliest and most complete record of this extraordinary experiment may be found in the Memorial Magazine, p. 245. The two of them the other Writings of Emerson, who are concerned with the art of psychology, which seems generally all Christian people, had a right to consider it as doubtful, but they were not authorized to send the mission of it.

1. Salmonella, 2. Ha. P. 2. Phageage de S. L. 1, 3. 4. Yersinia enterocolitica, 5. Shigella disenteriae et Angitia disenteriae. 1975, 10, 70.

¹ Entrepreneur, L. R. & J. J. Co., Inc., New York, N. Y.

1. The truly Eusebian Dialogus de Musica, all others to divide the story of Eusebian musicology, and seems to originate in the disappointment of Constantine, whose imperial house is now lost in the vague supposition of Innocent, a Tachite corruption of his son's name. For the original source is not preserved, 1. By the authors of music. 2. By the modern Greeks. 3. By the Arabs, whose writings are diffused over the wide extent of their conquests in Asia and Africa. See Platonic Bibliotheca Graecis, p. 215. 4. By the great learned Eusebius, and by the emperor himself in his public institution. Caesari's History of the Ottoman empire, p. 11.

1990年12月

and completed by his immediate successors, may not only amuse the fancy by the singular picture of a great empire, but will tend to illustrate the secret and internal causes of its rapid decay. In the pursuit of any remarkable institution, we may be frequently led into the more early or the more recent times of the Roman history: but the proper limits of this inquiry will be included within a period of about one hundred and thirty years, from the accession of Constantine to the publication of the Theodosian code; from which, as well as from the Notitia of the east and west, we derive the most copious and authentic information of the state of the empire. This variety of objects will suspend, for some time, the course of the narrative: but the interruption will be censured only by those readers who are insensible to the importance of laws and manners, while they peruse, with eager curiosity, the transient intrigues of a court, or the accidental event of a battle.

The manly pride of the Romans, content with substantial power, had left to the vanity of the East the forms and ceremonies of ostentatious

* The Theodosian code was promulgated A. D. 428. See the Encomium of Theodosius, v. 1, p. 183.

† Pausanias, in his chthonic commentary, judges to the same effect, and is similar to that of the Theodosian code: but the proofs are rather conjectures, not accurate facts. I should be rather inclined to place this useful work between the first edition of the code (A. D. 328), and the second (A. D. 407). See Hieron for Antonia Pausanias de Europae, tom. viii, p. 82.

CHAP.
XVII.

greatness. But when they lost even the semblance of those virtues which were derived from their ancient freedom, the simplicity of Roman manners was insensibly corrupted by the stately affectation of the courts of Asia. The distinctions of personal merit and influence, so conspicuous in a republic, so feeble and obscure under a monarchy, were abolished by the despotism of the emperors; who substituted in their room a severe subordination of rank and office, from the titled slaves who were seated on the steps of the throne, to the meanest instruments of arbitrary power. This multitude of sject dependents was interested in the support of the actual government, from the dread of a revolution, which might at once confound their hopes, and intercept the reward of their services. In this divine hierarchy (for such it is frequently styled), every rank was marked with the most scrupulous exactness, and its dignity was displayed in a variety of trifling and solemn ceremonies, which it was a study to learn, and a sacrilege to neglect.* The purity of the Latin language was debased, by adopting, in the intercourse of pride and flattery, a profusion

* Nullius in orbe superioris, nullus, nisi iussu superioris, nullus imperio superioris, apud quos sit superioris, nulla circumstantia. Tacit. Annal. iv. 21. The gradation from the style of freedom and equality, to that of form and servitude, may be traced in the Epistles of Cicero, of Pliny, and of Symmachus.

* The vulgar notion, after construing a law of pro-creancy published by Valentinian, the father of his dynasty, that condition of population subsisting with license, corruption, and a government defended by a single phalanx, was, quid dicitur procreantia (procreantia). Cal. Theod. l. vi. c. 1, leg. 7.

of epithets, which Tully would scarcely have understood, and which Augustus would have rejected with indignation. The principal officers of the empire were saluted, even by the sovereign himself, with the deceitful titles of your Sincerity, your Gravity, your Excellency, your Eminency, your sublime and wonderful Magnitude, your illustrious and magnificent Highness.⁶ The codicils or patents of their office were curiously emblazoned with such emblems as were best adapted to explain its nature and high dignity; the image or portrait of the reigning emperors; a triumphal car; the book of mandates placed on a table, covered with a rich carpet, and illuminated by four tapers; the allegorical figures of the provinces which they governed; or the appellations and standards of the troops whom they commanded. Some of these official emblems were really exhibited in their hall of audience; others preceded their pompous march whenever they appeared in public; and every circumstance of their demeanour, their dress, their ornaments, and their train, was calculated to inspire a deep reverence for the representatives of supreme majesty. By a philosophic observer, the system of the Roman government might have been mistaken for a splendid theatre, filled with players of every character and degree, who repeated the language, and imitated the passions of their original model.⁷

⁶ Consult the Nottia Imperialis, at the end of the Translation vol. vi. p. 214.

⁷ Præfatus of Nottia utriusque Imperii, p. 22. But his explanations are obscure, and he does not sufficiently distinguish the painted emblems from the effective ensigns of office.

CHAP.
XVII.ON THE ORDER OF
THE RANKS OF
ROMANS.

All the magistrates of sufficient importance to find a place in the general state of the empire, were accurately divided into three classes. 1. the Illustres; 2. the Spectabiles, or Respectabiles; and 3. the Clarissimi, whom we may translate by the word honorable. In the times of Roman simplicity, the last-mentioned epithet was used only as a vague expression of deference, till it became at length the peculiar and appropriated title of all who were members of the senate,* and consequently of all who, from that venerable body, were selected to govern the provinces. The vanity of those who, from their rank and office, might claim a superior distinction above the rest of the senatorial order, was long afterwards indulged with the new appellation of Respectable; but the title of Illustres was always reserved to some eminent personages, who were obeyed or revered by the two subordinate classes. It was communicated only, i. To the consuls and patricians; ii. To the praetorian prefects, with the prefects of Rome and Constantinople; iii. To the masters-general of the cavalry and the infantry; and iv. To the seven ministers of the palace, who exercised their sacred functions about the person of the emperor.† Among those illustrious magistrates who were esteemed co-ordinate with each other, the seniari-

* To the Pandects; which may be referred to the reign of the Antonines, Clavdianus is the ordinary and legal title of a senator.

† Pandect. p. 12-17. I have not taken any notice of the two inferior ranks, Perfectissimus and Exquisitus, which were given to many persons who were not raised to the senatorial dignity.

ty of appointment gave place to the union of dignities.¹ By the expedient of honorary codicils, the emperors, who were fond of multiplying their favours, might sometimes gratify the vanity, though not the ambition, of impatient courtiers.²

1. As long as the Roman consuls were the first CHAP. XVII. The consuls. magistrates of a free state, they derived their right to power from the choice of the people. As long as the emperors condescended to disguise the servitude which they imposed, the consuls were still elected by the real or apparent suffrage of the senate. From the reign of Diocletian even these vestiges of liberty were abolished, and the successful candidates who were invested with the annual honours of the consulship, affected to deplore the humiliating condition of their predecessors. The Scipios and the Catos had been reduced to solicit the votes of plebeians, to pass through the tedious and expensive forms of a popular election, and to expose their dignity to the shame of a public refusal; while their own happier fate had reserved them for an age and government in which the rewards of virtue were assigned by the unerring wisdom of a gracious sovereign.³ In the epistles which the emperor addressed to the two consuls elect, it was declared,

¹ Cod. Theodos. l. vi. tit. vi. The rules of precedence were determined with the same minute accuracy by the emperors, and illustrated with equal partiality by their learned interpreters.

² Cod. Theodos. l. vi. tit. xiii.

³ Aristotle (de Constitutione Aethiop.) hands expatiates on this unworthy topic, which is managed by Macrobius (Saturnalia. Vet. ed. 14. 19) with considerable more freedom and ingenuity.

CHAP. XVII. that they were created by his sole authority.* Their names and portraits, engraved on gilt tablets of ivory, were dispersed over the empire as presents to the provinces, the cities, the magistrates, the senate, and the people.† Their solemn inauguration was performed at the place of the imperial residence; and during a period of one hundred and twenty years, Rome was constantly deprived of the presence of her ancient magistrates.‡ On the morning of the first of January, the consuls assumed the ensigns of their dignity. Their dress was a robe of purple, embroidered in silk and gold, and sometimes ornamented with costly gems.§ On this

* Cum de consilio in annum revocati, solus moxus volitionis, — in consilio, et designati, et destinati, et privati nominatione; are some of the expressions employed by the emperor Gratian to his preceptor the poet Ausonius.

† Immensus bellis

Qui septi ferri in tabulis aureis militantes,

Insculpit nullius rebus consule iuram

Per proceres et vulgus eant.

Claud. in II. Cons. Seditio. 438.

Montfaucon has represented some of these tablets on dyptics; see Supplément à l'Antiquité expliquée, tom. IV., p. 274.

‡ Consule letabile post plerumq; verale vix

Palladium spes; agnovimus nostra consules

Auditis quondam perire; demeruisse cogit

Regna auratis Fata latetque Upla pector.

Claudian. in VI. Cons. Honorii, 327.

From the reign of Cyrus to the sixth consulship of Honorius, there was an interval of one hundred and twenty years, during which the emperors were always elected from Rome on the first day of January. See the Chronologia de Tillemont, tom. III., p. 4 & 5.

§ See Claudian in Cons. Pion. vi. Olybri 378, &c.; and in II. Claud. Honorii, 327, &c.; though in the latter it is not easy to separate the ornaments of the emperor from those of the consul. Ausonius received, from the liberality of Gratian, a vestis purpurea, or robe of state, in which the figure of the emperor Constantius was embroidered.

solemn occasion they were attended by the most eminent officers of the state and army, in the habit of senators; and the useless fuses, armed with the once formidable axes, were borne before them by the lictors.⁴ The procession moved from the palace to the forum, or principal square of the city; where the consuls ascended their tribunal, and seated themselves in the curule chairs, which were framed after the fashion of ancient times. They immediately exercised an act of jurisdiction, by the manumission of a slave, who was brought before them for that purpose; and the ceremony was intended to represent the celebrated action of the elder Brutus, the author of liberty and of the consulship, when he admitted among his fellow-citizens the faithful Vindex, who had revealed the conspiracy of the Tarquins.⁵ The public festival was continued during several days in all the principal cities; in Rome, from custom; in Constanti-

⁴ Curia et armania proceres legumque potestas

Patricios armatos lictores, et mores Gabine

Diadema virilli lego, postique perungit

Bellorum signa, equisque vacille Quirita.

Lictor cedens aequis, ridetque negatur

Miles, et in medio celsique rostris exornat.

Clodius in re Cons. Honorii, l.

— et lictoribus proceres radices aequat.

In Cons. Pauli, 288.

⁵ See Valerius ad Armanum. Macrobius, l. 2. 220. v. 7.

⁶ Amplexus sunt laici simul clamosa tribunal;

Te fasces innuere quos, i sublimis hinc

Orbis ibernus, delictorum studio inermis

Lex ardet, famulaturque iugo traxit hirci.

Donatus, et quos tantum curatior ictu.

Clodius in re Cons. Honorii, 611.

CHAP.
XVII.

people, from imitation; in Carthage, Antioch, and Alexandria, from the love of pleasure and the superfluity of wealth.¹ In the two capitals of the empire the annual games of the theatre, the circus, and the amphitheatre,² cost four thousand pounds of gold, (about) one hundred and sixty thousand pounds sterling; and if so heavy an expence surpassed the faculties or the inclination of the magistrates themselves, the sum was supplied from the imperial treasury.³ As soon as the consuls had discharged these customary duties, they were at liberty to retire into the shade of private life, and to enjoy, during the remainder of the year, the undisturbed contemplation of their own greatness. They no longer presided in the national councils; they no longer executed the resolutions of peace or war. Their abilities (unless they were employed in more effective offices) were of little moment; and their names served only as the legal date of the year in which they had filled the chair of Marius and of Cicero. Yet it was still felt and acknowledged, in the last period of Roman servitude, that this empty name might be compared, and even pre-

¹ Collocant quidem spectantes inter illos, quos adque velut quos ad locum spectant: et Roma, de civitate, et Constantinopolis de sedibus, et Antiochia pro iure, et Carthago, et domus hominum Alexandria, vel Tivoli, Prætoris (Senatus). Senatus in Tivoli, Antiochia.

² Claudius (in Ann. Hist. Theodori, 219-221) describes, in a lively and faithful manner, the various games of the circus, the theatre, and the amphitheatre, exhibited by the new emperor. The regularity and order of the games had already been purchased.

Procopius in Hist. Agrippæ, 2, 38.

CHÆ
XVII.

The patrician class.

ferred, to the possession of substantial power. The title of consul was still the most splendid object of ambition, the noblest reward of virtue and loyalty. The emperors themselves, who disdained the faint shadow of the republic, were conscious that they acquired an additional splendour and majesty as often as they assumed the annual honours of the consular dignity.*

The proudest and most perfect separation which can be found in any age or country, between the nobles and the people, is perhaps that of the patricians and the plebeians, as it was established in the first age of the Roman republic. Wealth and honours, the offices of the state, and the ceremonies of religion, were almost exclusively possessed by the former; who, preserving the purity of their blood with the most insulting jealousy,† held their clients in a condition of specious vassalage. But these distinctions, so incompatible with the spirit of a free people, were removed, after a long struggle, by the persevering efforts of the tribunes. The most active and successful of the plebeians accumulated wealth, ac-

* In Commodi Imperatoris inscription. (Mansueti in Pfloggy, Vol. 41, 2.) This excellent idea of the consularship is borrowed from his oration (10, § 107) pronounced to Julia in the senate of Constantinople. See the Alibi de la Monnaie (Mansueti de l'Académie, tom. 11, p. 394), who diligently pursued the vestiges of the old constitution, and who sometimes took them in his regions fancy.

† Intermarriages between the patricians and plebeians were prohibited by the laws of the six tables; and the uniform operations of history seem only to attest that the custom survived the law. See (Livy, 10, 1-5), the pride of family urged by the censor, and the rights of marriage asserted by the tribune Caninius.

CHAP.
XVII.

pired to honours, deserved triumphs, contracted alliances, and, after some generations, assumed the pride of ancient nobility.* The patrician families, on the other hand, whose original number was never recruited till the end of the commonwealth, either failed in the ordinary course of nature, or were extinguished in so many foreign and domestic wars, or, through a want of merit or fortune, ignominiously mingled with the mass of the people.† Very few remained who could derive their pure and genuine origin from the infancy of the city, or even from that of the republic, when Cæsar and Augustus, Claudius and Vespasian, created from the body of the senate a competent number of new patrician families, in the hope of perpetuating an order which was still considered as honourable and sacred.‡ But these artificial supplies (in which the reigning house

* For the celebrated partition drawn by Sulla, in the Jugurthine war, of the patres of the senate, and even of the virtuous Marius, who was obliged to leave the idea that the favour of the consulship should be bestowed on the ablest man of his countryman Hortensius (A. C.). Two hundred years before, the sons of the Marii themselves were acknowledged among the plebeians of Rome; and from that epoch began of their name of Carviliæ, there is reason to believe that those illustrious surnames derived their origin from a mother.

† In the case of Pompey, very few remained, not only of the old patrician families, but even of those who had been created by Cæsar and Augustus. (Tacit. Annal. iv. 23.) The family of Scipio (a branch of the patrician Junii) was degraded so low that his posterity, who carried the trade of a charcoal merchant, left him only ten slaves, and somewhat less than three hundred pounds sterling. (Festus Maximus, Clarus s. v. II, Annal. Vellei in Scipio.) The family was raised from obscurity by the merit of the son.

‡ Tacit. Annal. ii. 23. Ille Cornelius, s. v. p. 672. The virtues of Agrippa, who was created a patrician by the emperor Vespasian, reflected was always included) were rapidly swept away by the rage of tyrants, by frequent revolutions, by the change of manners, and by the intermixture of nations. Little more was left when Constantine ascended the throne, than a vague and imperfect tradition, that the patricians had once been the first of the Romans. To form a body of nobles, whose influence may restrain, while it secures the authority of the monarch, would have been very inconsistent with the character and policy of Constantine; but had he seriously entertained such a design, it might have exceeded the measure of his power to ratify, by an arbitrary edict, an institution which must expect the sanction of time and of opinion. He revived, indeed, the title of patricians; but he revived it as a personal, not as an hereditary distinction. They yielded only to the transient superiority of the annual consuls; but they enjoyed the pre-eminence over all the great officers of state, with the most familiar access to the person of the prince. This honourable rank was bestowed on them for life; and as they were usually favourites, and ministers who had grown old in the imperial court, the true etymorethical sense in that ancient name, but his ancestors had not any claim beyond an equestrian nobility.

This feature could have been almost impossible, if it were true, as Cassiodorus compels Aurelius Victor to affirm (last Section in Caes., c. 44. See Hist. August. p. 202, and Cassiodorus Comment. p. 220), that Vespasian retained at once a thousand patrician families. But this extravagant number is no more even for the whole senatorial order, unless we should include all the Roman knights who were distinguished by the permission of wearing the tunica.

CHAP.
XVII.

logy of the word was perverted by ignorance and flattery; and the patricians of Constantine were revered as the adopted fathers of the emperor and the republic.*

The prætorian prefects.

II. The fortunes of the prætorian prefects were essentially different from those of the consuls and patricians. The latter saw their ancient greatness evaporate in a vain title. The former, rising by degrees from the most humble condition, were invested with the civil and military administration of the Roman world. From the reign of Severus to that of Diocletian, the guards and the palace, the laws and the finances, the armies and the provinces, were entrusted to their superintending care: and, like the vizirs of the East, they held with one hand the seal, and with the other the standard of the empire. The ambition of the prefects, always formidable, and sometimes fatal, to the masters whom they served, was supported by the strength of the prætorian bands; but after those haughty troops had been weakened by Diocletian, and finally suppressed by Constantine, the prefects, who survived their fall, were reduced without difficulty to the station of useful and obedient ministers. When they were no longer responsible for the safety of the emperor's person, they resigned the jurisdiction which they had hitherto claimed and exercised over all the departments of the palace. They were deprived by Constantine of all military command, as soon as they had ceased to lead into the field, under their immediate orders, the flower of the Roman troops; and at length, by a singular revolution, the captains of the guards were transformed into the civil magistrates of the provinces. According to the plan of government instituted by Diocletian, the four princes had each their praetorian praefect; and, after the monarchy was once more united in the person of Constantine, he still continued to create the same number of five praefects, and entrusted to their care the same provinces which they already administered. 1, The praefect of the East stretched his ample jurisdiction into the three parts of the globe which were subject to the Romans, from the cataracts of the Nile to the banks of the Phasis, and from the mountains of Thrace to the frontiers of Persia: 2, The important provinces of Pannonia, Dacia, Macedonia, and Greece, once acknowledged the authority of the praefect of Illyrium: 3, The power of the praefect of Italy was not confined to the country from whence he derived his title; it extended over the additional territory of Raetia as far as the banks of the Danube, over the dependent islands of the Mediterranean, and over that part of the continent of Africa which lies between the confines of Cyrene and those of Tingitania: 4, The praefect of the Gauls comprehended under that plural denomination the kindred provinces of Britain and Spain, and his authority was obeyed from the wall of Antoninus to the foot of mount Atlas.*

* Tacitus, l. ii, p. 118; and Godefroy ad Cod. Theodos. l. vi, tit. vi.

* See Diocletian, l. ii. p. 105-110. If we had not fortunately possessed this satisfactory account of the division of the power and provinces

CHAP.
XVII.

After the prætorian præfects had been dismissed from all military command, the civil functions which they were ordained to exercise over so many subject nations, were adequate to the ambition and abilities of the most consummate ministers. To their wisdom was committed the supreme administration of justice and of the finances, the two objects which, in a state of peace, comprehend almost all the respective duties of the sovereign and of the people: of the former, to protect the citizens who are obedient to the laws; of the latter, to contribute the share of their property which is required for the expences of the state. The coin, the highways, the posts, the granaries, the manufactures, whatever could interest the public prosperity, was moderated by the authority of the prætorian præfects. As the immediate representatives of the imperial majesty, they were empowered to explain, to enforce, and on some occasions to modify, the general edicts by their discretionary proclamations. They watched over the conduct of the provincial governors, removed the negligent, and inflicted punishments on the guilty. From all the inferior jurisdictions, an appeal in every matter of importance, either civil or criminal, might be brought before the tribunal of the præfect; but his sentence was final and absolute; and the emperors themselves refused to admit any complaints against the judgment or the integrity of a magistrates of the prætorian præfects, we should frequently have been perplexed amid the copious details of the Code, and the circumstantial minutiae of the Novels.

strate whom they honoured with such unbounded confidence.⁵ His appointments were suitable to his dignity;⁶ and if avarice was his ruling passion, he enjoyed frequent opportunities of collecting a rich harvest of fees, of presents, and of perquisites. Though the emperors no longer dreaded the ambition of their prefects, they were attentive to counterbalance the power of this great office by the uncertainty and shortness of its duration.⁷

CHAP.
XVII

From their superior importance and dignity, Rome and Constantinople were alone excepted from the jurisdiction of the prætorian prefects. The immense size of the city, and the experience of the tardy, ineffectual operation of the laws, had furnished the policy of Augustus with a specious pretence for introducing a new magistrate, who alone could restrain a servile and turbulent populace by the strong arm of arbi-

The prefects of Rome and Constantinople.

⁵ See a law of Constantine himself. A prætorian system provided the prætorians, non doctores. Cod. Justinian. l. ult. tit. VIII. leg. 18. Charisius, a lawyer of the time of Constantine (Novæ Hæc. Juris Romani, p. 212), who adopts this law as a fundamental principle of jurisprudence, compares the prætorian prefects to the masters of the house of the ancient Romans. Pandect. l. 1, tit. 21.

⁶ When Justinian, in the exhausted condition of the empire, instituted a prætorian prefect for Africa, he allowed him a salary of one hundred pounds of gold. Cod. Justinian. l. 1, tit. XXII, leg. 1.

⁷ For this, and the other dignities of the empire, it may be well enough to refer to the ample commentaries of Pausanias and Orosius, who have diligently collected and accurately digested in their proper order all the legal and historical particulars. From these are drawn, Dr. Hume (History of the World, vol. II, p. 24-27) has deduced a very distinct sketch of the state of the Roman empire.

CHAP.
XVII.

trary power; Valerius Messalla was appointed the first prefect of Rome, that his reputation might countenance so invidious a measure: but, at the end of a few days, that accomplished citizen¹ resigned his office, declaring, with a spirit worthy of the friend of Brutus, that he found himself incapable of exercising a power incompatible with public freedom.² As the sense of liberty became less exquisite, the advantages of order were more clearly understood; and the prefect, who seemed to have been designed as a terror only to slaves and vagrants, was permitted to extend his civil and criminal jurisdiction over the equestrian and noble families of Rome. The pretors, annually created as the judges of law and equity, could not long dispute the possession of the forum with a vigor-

¹ Tacit. Annal. vi. 11. Fasti to Chron. p. 155. Dion Cassius, in the oration of Murena (l. vii. p. 675), describes the private genius of the prefect of the city as they were established in his own time.

² The fame of Messalla has been severely equal to his merit. In the earliest youth, he was recommended by Cæsar to the friendship of Brutus. He followed the standard of the republic till it was smitten in the battle of Philippi. He then resigned and desired the favour of the most moderate of the conquerors; and ardently asserted his freedom and liberty in the court of Augustus. The triumph of Messalla was provided by the request of Agrippa. As an orator, he dispersed the palm of eloquence with Cicero himself. Messalla cultivated every talent, and was the patron of every man of genius. He spent his evenings in philosophic conversation with Horace; sustained his place at table between Dolia and Thales; and adorned his leisure by encouraging the poetical talents of young Ovid.

³ Tacitus Annal. viii. 2. Fasti to Chron. p. 155. The translation of Tacitus. Tacitus expresses the same idea in other words: quam necessaria preterea.

ous and permanent magistrate, who was usually admitted into the confidence of the prince. Their courts were deserted, their number, which had once fluctuated between twelve and eighteen,* was gradually reduced to two or three, and their important functions were confined to the expensive obligation† of exhibiting games for the amusement of the people. After the office of the Roman consuls had been changed into a vain pageant, which was rarely displayed in the capital, the prefects assumed their vacant place in the senate, and were soon acknowledged as the ordinary presidents of that venerable assembly. They received appeals from the distance of one hundred miles; and it was allowed as a principle of jurisprudence, that all municipal authority was derived from them alone.‡ In the discharge of his laborious employment, the governor of Rome was assisted by fifteen officers, some of whom had been originally his equals, or even his superiors. The principal departments were relative to the command of a numerous watch established as a

* See Lipsius, Romanorum It. et Viti. Tacit. Annal.

† Hermann Hübner, Juris Civilis secund. veterum Pandect. tom. 1. p. 10. See Species Speculatio de Viti. Nominum. tom. II. Dissert. 2. p. 119. In the year 426, Martian published a law, that these officers should be annually created persons of considerable rank by the choice of the senate, but with their own assent. Code Justinien. l. 1. de senat. leg. 2.

‡ Quodvis Ignoratus servat adhibitionem, ad s. v. vltima peritiorum ; and it is said that verumtamen infirmum. Ulpian in Furi. Inst. l. 1. de off. 441. s. l. He probably is mistaken in the nature of the power, who, in the title of Immunis (l. 1. de vet. leg. 16.) is declared a private and unconnected citizen, and is not as verumtamen Ignoratus is.

CHAP.
XVII.

safeguard against fires, robberies, and nocturnal disorders; the custody and distribution of the public allowance of corn and provisions; the care of the port, of the aqueducts, of the common sewers, and of the navigation and bed of the Tyber; the inspection of the markets, the theatres, and of the private as well as public works. Their vigilance ensured the three principal objects of a regular police: safety, plenty, and cleanliness; and as a proof of the attention of government to preserve the splendour and ornaments of the capital, a particular inspector was appointed for the statues; the guardian, as it were, of that inanimate people, which, according to the extravagant computation of an old writer, was scarcely inferior in number to the living inhabitants of Rome. About thirty years after the foundation of Constantinople, a similar magistrate was created in that rising metropolis, for the same uses, and with the same powers. A perfect equality was established between the dignity of the two municipal, and that of the four prætorian, prefects.*

The presents, vices, pro-
fects, &c.

Those who, in the imperial hierarchy, were distinguished by the title of Respectable, formed an intermediate class between the illustrious prefects and the honourable magistrates of the provinces. In this class the pro-consuls of Asia, Achaia, and Africa, claimed a pre-eminence,

* Besides our usual guides, we may observe, that Felleo has written a separate history, De Præfectorum Urbis; and that many curious details concerning the police of Rome and Constantinople are contained in the fourteenth book of the Theodosian Code.

which was yielded to the remembrance of their ancient dignity; and the appeal from their tribunal to that of the prefects was almost the only mark of their dependency.* But the civil government of the empire was distributed into thirteen great dioceses, each of which equalled the just measure of a powerful kingdom. The first of these dioceses was subject to the jurisdiction of the emperor of the East; and we may convey some idea of the importance and variety of his functions, by observing, that six hundred apparitors, who would be styled at present either secretaries, or clerks, or ushers, or messengers, were employed in his immediate office.† The place of Augustal prefect of Egypt was no longer filled by a Roman knight; but the name was retained; and the extraordinary powers which the situation of the country, and the temper of the inhabitants, had once made indispensable, were still continued to the governor. The eleven remaining dioceses, of Asia, Pontica, and Thracia; of Macedonia, Dacia, and Pannonia or Western Illyria; of Italy and Africa; of Gaul, Spain, and Britain; were governed by twelve *viceroy*s, or *viceroy*s profecti;

* Varro agrees, that the jurisdiction of these was independent of the prefect; while scilicet, however, in accordance with some opinions, the jurisdiction of the profecti he held entirely distinct. Pantheon, p. 101.

† The jurisdiction of Africa had then limited apparatus; and they all removed large numbers, either from the treasury or the provinces. See Palæstra, p. 26, and Orig. Justinian, p. 26, 27, 28, 29.

‡ In Italy there was likewise the Prince of Rome. It has been much disputed, whether his jurisdiction extended over limited subjects.

CHAP.
XVII.

whose name sufficiently explains the nature and dependence of their office. It may be added, that the lieutenant-generals of the Roman armies, the military counts and dukes, who will be hereafter mentioned, were allowed the rank and title of Respectable.

The ge-nerality of the provinces.

As the spirit of jealousy and ostentation prevailed in the councils of the emperors, they proceeded with anxious diligence to divide the substance, and to multiply the titles of power. The vast countries which the Roman conquerors had united under the same simple form of administration, were imperceptibly crumbled into minute fragments: till at length the whole empire was distributed into one hundred and sixteen provinces, each of which supported an expensive and splendid establishment. Of these, three were governed by proconsuls, thirty-seven by consules, five by correctors, and seventy-one by presidents. The appellations of these magistrates were different; they ranked in successive order, the ensigns of their dignity were variously varied, and their situation, from accidental circumstances, might be more or less agreeable or advantageous. But they were all (excepting only the proconsuls) alike included in the class of honourable persons; and they were alike entrusted, during the pleasure of the prince, and under the authority of the prefects or their deputies, with the administration of justice and the finances in their respective districts. The ponderous volumes of the codes and pandects¹ would furnish ample materials for a minute inquiry into the system of provincial government, as in the space of six centuries it was improved by the wisdom of the Roman statesmen and lawyers. It may be sufficient for the historian to select two singular and salutary provisions intended to restrain the abuse of authority. 1. For the preservation of peace and order, the governors of the provinces were armed with the sword of justice. They inflicted corporal punishments, and they exercised, in capital offences, the power of life and death. But they were not authorised to indulge the condemned criminal with the choice of his own execution, or to pronounce a sentence of the mildest and most honourable kind of exile. These prerogatives were reserved to the prefects, who alone could impose the heavy fine of fifty pounds of gold: their viceregents were confined to the trifling weight of a few ounces.² This distinction, which seems to grant the larger, while it denies the smaller degree of authority, was founded on a very rational motive. The smaller degree was infinitely more liable to abuse. The passions of a provincial magistrate might frequently provoke him into acts of oppression,

Branches of the empire which it stretched over the ten southern provinces of Italy.

Among the works of the celebrated Hippia, there was one in the hands, concerning the office of a physician, whose title in the most important articles, were the same as those of an ordinary physician of a province.

[illegible]

CHAP.
XVII.

which affected only the freedom or the fortunes of the subject; though, from a principle of prudence, perhaps of humanity, he might still be terrified by the guilt of innocent blood. It may likewise be considered, that exile, considerable fines, or the choice of an easy death, relate more particularly to the rich and the noble; and the persons the most exposed to the avarice or resentment of a provincial magistrate, were thus removed from his obscure persecution to the more august and impartial tribunal of the pætorian præfect. 2. As it was reasonably apprehended that the integrity of the judge might be biased, if his interest was concerned, or his affections were engaged, the strictest regulations were established to exclude any person, without the special dispensation of the emperor, from the government of the province where he was born;* and to prohibit the governor or his son from contracting marriage with a native or an inhabitant;† or from purchasing slaves, lands, or houses, within the extent of his jurisdiction.‡ Notwithstanding these rigorous precautions, the emperor Constantine, after a reign of twenty-five years, still deploras the venal and oppressive administration of justice, and expresses the warmest indignation that the audience of the judge, his dispatch of business, his reasonable delays, and his final sentence, were publicly sold, either by himself, or by the officers of his court. The continuance, and perhaps the impunity of these crimes, is attested by the repetition of impotent laws, and ineffectual menaces.*

* Ut nulli potius sine advertisemente et specialis principis permissione provinciarum. Cod. Theodos. l. 1, tit. 11. This law was first enacted by the emperor Maxentius, after the rebellion of Constantine (A.D. 312). The same regulation is observed in China, with equal strictness, and with equal effect.

† Paulus. l. 24th, tit. 1, c. 28, 37, 38.

‡ In jur. constitutioni, we find the following constitution also and comparative. Cod. Theod. c. 10, tit. 1, l. 1. The manner of exempting law was ordered by a statute which gave the regulation to the civil laws themselves in Rome. From this prohibition, which is recorded in the second office of the governor, they except only fathers and provinces. The prohibition within five years may be renewed; after which, an indissoluble bond is to the province.

All the civil magistrates were drawn from the ^{the pro-}profession of the law. The celebrated institutes ^{founder of} of Justinian are addressed to the youth of his dominions who had devoted themselves to the study of Roman jurisprudence; and the sovereign condescends to animate their diligence, by the assurance that their skill and ability would in time be rewarded by an adequate share in the government of the republic.² The rudiments of this lucrative science were taught in all the considerable cities of the East and West; but the most famous school was that of Berytus,³ on the

[illegible]

* Although little use, at least studies have shown that the use of a "recommender" or "advisor" machine, to assist the graduate student in the selection of courses, is preferred, even when a student responds to such a machine as a valueless grade-grader. Therefore, he prefers to select courses.

* The splendour of the ceiling of Bayezid, which preserved in the East the memory and sanctity of the Prophet, must be preserved.

CHAP. XVII.
const. of Phariela, which flourished above three centuries from the time of Alexander Severus, the author, perhaps, of an institution so advantageous to his native country. After a regular course of education, which lasted five years, the students dispersed themselves through the provinces, in search of fortune and honours; nor could they want an inexhaustible supply of business in a great empire, already corrupted by the multiplicity of laws, of arts, and of vices. The court of the prætorian præfect of the East could alone furnish employment for one hundred and fifty advocates, sixty-four of whom were distinguished by peculiar privileges, and two were annually chosen, with a salary of sixty pounds of gold, to defend the causes of the treasury. The first experiment was made of their judicial talents, by appointing them to act occasionally as assessors to the magistrates; from thence they were often raised to preside in the tribunals before which they had pleaded. They obtained the government of a province; and, by the aid of merit, of reputation, or of favour, they ascended, by successive steps, to the illustrious dignities of the state.* In the practice of the

to have learnt from the third to the middle of the sixth century—Hæverus, Surv. Rom. Hist. p. 312-316.

1. As in a former period I have traced the civil and military progression of Pontius, I shall here trace the civil honors of Marcus Tullius. 1. He was distinguished by his eloquence, which he displayed so effectively in the court of the prætorian præfect. 2. He governed one of the provinces of Africa, either as præfect or consul, and decorated by his administration, the name of a benefactor. 3. He was appointed twice to the post of prætorian præfect. 4. Consul. 5. Consul of the civil legions. 6. Prætorian præfect bar, these men had considered reason as the instrument of dispute; they interpreted the laws according to the dictates of private interest; and the same pernicious habits might still adhere to their characters in the public administration of the state. The honour of a liberal profession has indeed been vindicated by ancient and modern advocates, who have filled the most important stations, with pure integrity and consummate wisdom; but in the decline of Roman jurisprudence, the ordinary promotion of lawyers was pregnant with mischief and disgrace. The noble art, which had once been preserved as the sacred inheritance of the patricians, was fallen into the hands of freedmen and plebeians,* who, with cunning rather than with skill, exercised a sordid and pernicious trade. Some of them procured admittance into families for the purpose of fomenting differences, of encouraging suits, and of preparing a harvest of gain for themselves or their bre-

of the Greeks; while he might yet be represented as a young man. 7. After a short, perhaps a trifling, of study years, which Maffius accompanied by some travels with the poet Manlius; see Fulvius Ursinus Historia Livii ad. Ercol. tom. 6. c. 18. p. 304, employed in the study of the Greek philosophy, he was named professor of Italy in the year 80, A. While he still enjoyed that great office, he was created, in the year 86, consul for the War; and his name, on account of the victory of his campaigns, the youth introduced, often made story in the Forum. 8. In the year 88, Maffius was appointed a second time professor of Italy. Even in the civil wars of Gallus, he may discover the merit of Maffius Thucydides, who, by a rare felicity, was the favourite friend both of Sylla and of S. Augustus. See Tacitus, Hist. des Rom. tom. 5. p. 1116-1118.

* Memoriarum de Pueris Var. c. 20. Antiquarum et Philologicarum p. 110.

CHAB. then. Others, retired in their chambers, main-XVII. tained the dignity of legal professors, by furnishing a rich client with subtleties to confound the plainest truth, and with arguments to colour the most unjustifiable pretensions. The splendid and popular class was composed of the advocates, who filled the forum with the sound of their torgid and loquacious rhetoric. Careless of fame and of justice, they are described, for the most part, as ignorant and rapacious guides, who conducted their clients through a maze of expence, of delay, and of disappointment; from whence,
 after a tedious series of years, they were at length dismissed, when their patience and fortune were almost exhausted.*

The military officers.

III. In the system of policy introduced by Augustus, the governors, those at least of the imperial provinces, were invested with the full powers of the sovereign himself. Ministers of peace and war, the distribution of rewards and punishments depended on them alone, and they successively appeared on the tribunal in the robes of civil magistracy, and in complete armour at the head of the Roman legions.† The influence of the re-

* The various passages of Agrippina (l. 424, v. 94, &c.) in which she paints the dissimuli of contemporary lawyers, affords a strange collection of sound sense, false phrases, and extravagant satire. Galsworthy (History of Civil Law, v. 1, p. 188) supports the historian by similar complaints, and authentic facts. In the fourth century, many students might have been taken with law books. Prosopius to Vid.
Epist. p. 77.

† See a very splendid example in the life of Agrippa, particularly v. 20, 21. The lieutenant of Britain was entrusted with the same powers which Cæsar, possessed of Gaul, had exercised in the name of the senate and people.

venue, the authority of law, and the command of a military force, concurred to render their power supreme and absolute: and whenever they were tempted to violate their allegiance, the loyal province which they involved in their rebellion was scarcely sensible of any change in its political state. From the time of Commodus to the reign of Constantine, near one hundred governors might be enumerated, who, with various success, erected the standard of revolt: and though the innocent were too often sacrificed, the guilty might be sometimes prevented, by the suspicious cruelty of their master. To secure his throne and the public tranquillity from these formidable servants, Constantine resolved to divide the military from the civil administration: and to establish, as a permanent and professional distinction, a practice which had been adopted only as an occasional expedient. The supreme jurisdiction exercised by the prætorian præfects over the armies of the empire was transferred to the two magistri-general whom he instituted, the one for the cavalry, the other for the infantry; and though each of these illustrious officers was more particularly responsible for the discipline of those troops which were under his immediate inspection, they both indifferently commanded in the field the several bodies, whether of horse or foot,

[The Abbé Dufour, who has translated with accuracy the Annals de l'Empire Romain, tom. i. p. 44-100, vol. 1767, the institution of Augustus and of Constantine, observes, that if Otho had been put to death the day before he executed his conspiracy, Otho would now appear in history as lieutenant of Caracalla.

CHAP. which were united in the same army.¹ Their XVII. number was soon doubled, by the division of the East and West; and as separate generals of the same rank and title were appointed on the four important frontiers of the Rhine, of the Upper and of the Lower Danube, and of the Euphrates;
the defence of the Roman empire was at length committed to eight masters-general of the cavalry and infantry. Under their orders, thirty-five military commanders were stationed in the provinces; three in Britain, six in Gaul, one in Spain, one in Italy, five on the Upper, and four on the Lower Danube; in Asia eight, three in Egypt, and four in Africa. The titles of counts and dukes,² by which they were properly distinguished, have obtained in modern languages so very different a sense, that the use of them may occasion some surprise. But it should be recollected, that the second of those appellations is only a corruption of the Latin word, which was indiscriminately applied to any military chief. All these provincial generals were therefore dukes; but no more than ten among them were dignified with the rank of counts, or companions, a title of honour, or rather of favour, which had been recently invented in the court of Constantine. A gold belt was the ensign which distinguished the office of the counts and dukes; and besides their pay, they received a liberal allowance sufficient to maintain one hundred and ninety servants, and one hundred and fifty-eight horses. They were strictly prohibited from interfering in any matter which related to the administration of justice or the revenue; but the command which they exercised over the troops of their department, was independent of the authority of the magistrates. About the same time that Constantine gave a legal sanction to the ecclesiastical order, he instituted in the Roman empire the nice balance of the civil and the military powers. The emulation, and sometimes the discord, which reigned between two professions of opposite interests and incompatible manners, was productive of beneficial and of pernicious consequences. It was seldom to be expected that the general and the civil governor of a province should either conspire for the disturbance, or should unite for the service of their country. While the one delayed to offer the assistance which the other distained to solicit, the troops very frequently remained without orders or without supplies; the public safety was destroyed, and the defenceless subjects were left exposed to the fury of the barbarians. The divided administration, which had been formed by Constantine, relaxed the vigour of the state, while it secured the tranquillity of the monasteries.

¹ Zosimus, l. ii. p. 116. Before the end of the reign of Constantine, the emperor's soldiers were already increased to four. See Valesius ad Zosimum, l. ii. c. 7.

² Though the military counts and dukes are frequently mentioned, both in history and the codes, we must keep ourselves in the N. B. as for the exact force of these words and titles. For the best authority, rank, precedence, &c. of the counts or generals, see Cod. Theod. l. vi. tit. xli. c. 1, with the commentary of Cujacius.

The memory of Constantine has been deservedly censured for another innovation which cor-Disunion
of the troops

CHAP.
XVII

rupted military discipline, and prepared the ruin of the empire. The nineteen years which preceded his final victory over Licinius, had been a period of licence and intestine war. The rivals who contended for the possession of the Roman world, had withdrawn the greatest part of their forces from the guard of the general frontier; and the principal cities which formed the boundary of their respective dominions were filled with soldiers, who considered their countrymen as their most implacable enemies. After the use of these internal garrisons had ceased with the civil war, the conquerors wanted either wisdom or firmness to revive the severe discipline of Diocletian, and to suppress a fatal indulgence, which habit had enervated and almost confounded in the military order. From the reign of Constantine a popular and even legal distinction was admitted between the *Palatini and the Honorarii; the troops of the court, as they were improperly styled, and the troops of the frontier. The former, elevated by the superiority of their pay and privileges, were permitted, except in the extraordinary emergencies of war, to occupy their tranquil stations in the heart of the provinces. The most flourishing cities were oppressed by the intolerable weight of quarters. The soldiers insensibly forgot the virtues of their profession, and contracted only the

* Palatini, l. 3, p. 111. The distinction between the two kinds of Roman troops is very clearly expressed in the regulations for their dress, and the Palatini, Adornati, Inducti, the clothing prescribed to them, which Godefroy has drawn, op. cit. at the several foot, de Dr. Hilmart, of the Thesaurus Code, l. vii, tit. 1, leg. 18. l. 119. tit. 1, leg. 10.

vices of civil life. They were either degraded by the industry of mechanic trades, or enervated by the luxury of baths and theatres. They soon became careless of their martial exercises, curious in their diet and apparel; and while they inspired terror to the subjects of the empire, they trembled at the hostile approach of the barbarians.* The chain of fortifications which Diocletian and his colleagues had extended along the banks of the great rivers, was no longer maintained with the same care, or defended with the same vigilance. The numbers which still remained under the name of the troops of the frontier, might be sufficient for the ordinary defence: but their spirit was degraded by the humiliating reflection, that they who were exposed to the hardships and dangers of a perpetual warfare, were rewarded only with about two-thirds of the pay and emolument which were lavished on the troops of the court. Even the bands or legions that were raised the nearest to the level of those unworthy favourites, were in some measure disgraced by the title of honour which they were allowed to assume. It was in vain that Constantine repeated the most dreadful measures of fire and sword against the borderers who should dare to desert their colours, to connive at the incursions of the barbarians, or to

* Plures erant in summo milite et equite, quamvis non de fronte, ut Severus, Augustinus, 2. tit. 2. 4. He observes that they lived downy beds and houses of marble; and that their crops were heavier than those of the Gauls.

CHAP. XVII. participate in the spoil.* The mischiefs which flow from injudicious counsels are seldom removed by the application of partial severities: and though succeeding princes laboured to restore the strength and numbers of the frontier garrisons, the empire, till the last moment of its dissolution, continued to languish under the mortal wound which had been so rashly or so weakly inflicted by the hand of Constantine.

Reduction
of the legions.

The same third policy of dividing whatever is united, of reducing whatever is eminent, of dreading every active power, and of expecting that the most feeble will prove the most obedient, served to pervade the institutions of several princes, and particularly those of Constantine. The martial pride of the legions, whose victorious camps had so often been the scene of rebellion, was mortified by the memory of their past exploits, and the consciousness of their actual strength. As long as they maintained their ancient establishment of six thousand men, they subsisted, under the reign of Diocletian, each of them singly, a visible and important object in the military history of the Roman empire. A few years afterwards, these gigantic bodies were shrunk to a very diminutive size; and when seven legions, with some auxiliaries, defended the city of Amida against the Persians, the total garrison, with the inhabitants of both sexes, and the peasants of the deserted country, did not exceed the number of twenty thousand persons.² From this fact, and from similar examples, there is reason to believe, that the constitution of the legionary troops, to which they partly owed their valour and discipline, was dissolved by Constantine; and that the bands of Roman infantry, which still assumed the same names and the same honours, consisted only of one thousand or fifteen hundred men.³ The conspiracy of so many separate detachments, each of which was awed by the sense of its own weakness, could easily be shattered; and the successors of Constantine might indulge their love of ostentation, by issuing their orders to one hundred and thirty-two legions, inscribed on the counter-roll of their numerous armies. The remainder of their troops was distributed into several hundred cohorts of infantry, and squadrons of cavalry. Their arms, and titles, and ensigns, were calculated to inspire terror, and to display the variety of nations who marched under the imperial standard. And not a vestige was left of that severe simplicity, which, in the ages of freedom and victory, had distinguished the line of battle of a Roman army from the confined host of an Asiatic monarch.⁴ A more particular enumeration

* Comp. Plutarch l. vii. c. 1, p. 1, vii. c. 2. See Hume's Hist. of the World, vol. iii. p. 18. That emperor himself, who is not universally known, seems to justify the character and policy of Constantine.

THE
FIVE

* Journal of the A. S. N. S. The observer is so struck by the appearance of the two yellow lozenges that he compares them to a pair of eyes, or a pair of small, round, yellow lozenges.

³ P. B. Pichard et al. Nature, p. 66. Memories of P. Anstey, The Engineer, 1900, vol. 101, p. 311.

² Stomoxys calcitrans (Linn.) is a common pest of domestic animals, especially of cattle. It is a blood-sucking fly, and its bites are very annoying. It is also a vector of disease, and its control is important.

CHAP.
XVII.

drawn from the Notitia, might exercise the diligence of an antiquary; but the historian will content himself with observing, that the number of permanent stations or garrisons established on the frontiers of the empire, amounted to five hundred and eighty-three; and that, under the successors of Constantine, the complete force of the military establishment was computed at six hundred and forty-five thousand soldiers.* An effort so prodigious surpassed the wants of a more ancient; and the facilities of a later, period.

Difficulty
of living.

In the various states of society, armies are recruited from very different motives. Barbarians are urged by the love of war; the citizens of a free republic may be prompted by a principle of duty; the subjects, or at least the nobles of a monarchy, are animated by a sentiment of honour; but the timid and luxurious inhabitants of a declining empire must be allured into the service by the hopes of profit, or compelled by the dread of punishment. The resources of the Roman treasury were exhausted by the increase of pay, by the repetition of donatives, and by the invention of new emoluments and indulgences, which, in the opinion of the provincial youth, might compensate the hardships and dangers of a military life. Yet, although the stature was lower-structum æthiopsque viri. T. Liv. l. xxxv. p. 82-83. Plinius, when before the senate, had compared the weight of Antiochus to a support, in which the bulk of our viri seemed was overborne by the skill of the youth. See the life of Plutarch in Plutarch.

* Agrippa, l. v. p. 112, with Livius.

ed,* although slaves, at least by a tacit connivance, were indiscriminately received into the ranks, the insurmountable difficulty of procuring a regular and adequate supply of volunteers, obliged the emperors to adopt more effectual and coercive methods. The lands bestowed on the veterans, as the free reward of their valour, were henceforward granted under a condition, which contains the first rudiments of the feudal tenures; that their sons, who succeeded to the inheritance, should devote themselves to the profession of arms, as soon as they attained the age of manhood; and their cowardly refusal was punished by the loss of honour, of fortune, or even of life.[†] But as the annual growth of the sons of the veterans bore a very small proportion to the demands of the service, levies of men were frequently required from the provinces, and every proprietor was obliged either to take up arms, or to procure a substitute, or to purchase his exemption by the payment of a heavy fine. The sum of forty-two pieces of gold, to which it was reduced, ascertains the exorbitant price of volunteers, and the reluct-

* Vegetius (Cod. Theodos. l. vii. tit. viii. leg. 2) fixes the standard at six feet seven inches above the feet, and a half English measure. It had formerly been five feet ten inches, and is the best size six Roman feet. See also our superior antiquaries, especially regarding military armour. Vegetius de Re Militari l. i. c. 2.

† See the two titles, De Veteranis, and De Fidei Veteranorum, in the seventh book of the Theodosian Code. The age at which these military services was required, varied from twenty-five to six years. If the sons of the veterans appeared with a horse, they had a right to serve in the cavalry; two horses — then some valuable privileges.

CHAP.
IXVII.

ance with which the government admitted of this alternative.* Such was the horror for the profession of a soldier, which had affected the minds of the degenerate Romans, that many of the youth of Italy, and the provinces, chose to cut off the fingers of their right hand to escape from being pressed into the service; and this strange expedient was so commonly practised, as to deserve the severe animalversion of the law,† and a peculiar name in the Latin language.‡

Increase of barbarians into the Roman armies.

The introduction of barbarians into the Roman armies became every day more universal, more necessary, and more fatal. The most daring of the Scythians, of the Goths, and of the Germans, who delighted in war, and who found it more

* Cod. Theod. l. vii. tit. xxi. leg. 3. According to the Historia Romanorum, the Emperor Valens sometimes required eighty pieces of gold for a recruit. In the following law it is faintly expressed, that slaves shall not be admitted into the Roman armies, interdum militibus iurem.

† The person and property of a Roman knight, who had mutilated his two arms, were sold at public auction by order of Augustus. (Quint. in August. c. 21.) The moderation of that cruel emperor proved, that this example of severity was justified by the spirit of the times. Ammianus makes a distinction between the effeminate Italians and the hardy Goths. (li. xv. c. 18.) Yet only thirty years afterwards, Valentinian, in a law addressed to the prefect of Gaul, is obliged to exact that those cowardly deserters shall be burnt alive. (Cod. Theod. l. vii. tit. xiii. leg. 3.) These numbers of deserters were so considerable, that the province complained of a scarcity of recruits. (Id. leg. 10.)

‡ They were called Mutili. Mutilatores is found in Plinius and Festus, to denote a very and severely person, who, according to Ammianus and Augustin, was under the immediate protection of the golden Murex. From this particular instance of severity, severity is used in a general sense to denote, by the writers of the middle Latinity. See Lindahed lucy and Valentin of Ammian. Novellus l. vi. c. 21.

profitable to defend than to ravage the provinces, were enrolled, not only in the auxiliaries of their respective nations, but in the legions themselves, and among the most distinguished of the Palatine troops. As they freely mingled with the subjects of the empire, they gradually learned to despise their manners, and to imitate their arts. They acquired the implicit reverence, which the pride of Rome had exacted from their ignorance, while they acquired the knowledge and possession of those advantages by which alone she supported her declining greatness. The barbarian soldiers, who displayed any military talents, were advanced, without exception, to the most important commands; and the names of the tribunes, of the counts and dukes, and of the generals themselves, betray a foreign origin, which they no longer condescended to disguise. They were often entrusted with the conduct of a war against their countrymen; and though most of them preferred the ties of allegiance to those of blood, they did not always avoid the guilt, or at least the suspicion, of holding a treasonable correspondence with the enemy, of inviting his invasion, or of sparing his retreat. The camps and the palace of the son of Constantine were governed by the powerful faction of the Franks, who preserved the strictest connection with each other, and with their country; and who resented every personal affront as a national indignity.

* Melioribus conditionibus Proponi speramus, ut Imperialis in nostris militibus fortitudo, cumque ipsa legationibus parum, admodumque, Amicitia, & ceteris, & c.

CHAP.
XVII.

When the tyrant Caligula was suspected of an intention to invest a very extraordinary candidate with the consular robes, the sacrilegious profanation would have scarcely excited less astonishment, if, instead of a horse, the noblest chieftain of Germany or Britain had been the object of his choice. The revolution of three centuries had produced so remarkable a change in the prejudices of the people, that, with the public approbation, Constantine showed his successors the example of bestowing the honours of the consulship on the barbarians, who, by their merit and services, had deserved to be ranked among the first of the Romans.* But as these hardy veterans, who had been educated in the ignorance or contempt of the laws, were incapable of exercising any civil offices, the powers of the human mind were contracted by the irreconcilable separation of talents as well as of professions. The accomplished citizens of the Greek and Roman republics, whose characters could adapt themselves to the bar, the senate, the camp, or the schools, had learned to write, to speak, and to act, with the same spirit, and with equal abilities.

Seven millions of the palace.

iv. Besides the magistrates and generals, who at a distance from the court diffused their dele-

* Barbaros consulum potuit, ad augur' forum accessit et iustorum consilium. Ammian. l. xx. c. lx. Constantin (le) VIE Consulaire. L. lxxv. 75 and Agathias Varro seem to confirm the truth of this assertion; yet in the thirty-seventh consular Fasti of the reign of Constantine, I cannot observe the name of a single barbarian. I should therefore suspect the falseness of that prince, as relative to the city at least, rather than to the office, of the consulship.

gated authority over the provinces and armies, the emperor conferred the rank of illustris on seven of his more immediate servants, to whose fidelity he entrusted his safety, or his counsels, or his treasures. 1. The private apartments of the palace were governed by a favourite eunuch, who, in the language of that age, was styled the prepositus or prefect of the sacred bed-chamber. His duty was to attend the emperor in his hours of state, or in those of amusement, and to perform about his person all those menial services, which can only derive their splendour from the influence of royalty. Under a prince who deserved to reign, the great chamberlain (for such we may call him) was an useful and humble domestic; but an artful domestic, who improves every occasion of unguarded confidence, will insensibly acquire over a feeble mind that ascendant which harsh wisdom and uncompromising virtue can seldom obtain. The degenerate grandsons of Theodosius, who were invisible to their subjects, and contemptible to their enemies, exalted the prefects of their bed-chamber above the heads of all the ministers of the palace; and even his deputy, the first of the splendid train of slaves who waited in the presence, was thought worthy to rank before the respectable proconsuls of Greece or Asia. The jurisdiction of the chamberlain was acknowledged by the counts, or superintendants, who regulated the two important provinces, of the magnificence of the wardrobe, and of the luxury of the

¹ Cod. Theod. l. vi. tit. 8.

CHAP.
XVII.
The transfer of the william.

imperial title.* 2. The principal administration of public affairs was committed to the diligence and abilities of the master of the offices.† He was the supreme magistrate of the palace, inspected the discipline of the civil and military schools, and received appeals from all parts of the empire; in the causes which related to that numerous army of privileged persons, who, as the servants of the court, had obtained, for themselves and families, a right to decline the authority of the ordinary judges. The correspondence between the prince and his subjects was managed by the four sereniti, or officers of this minister of state. The first was appropriated to memorials, the second to epistles, the third to petitions, and the fourth to papers and orders of a miscellaneous kind. Each of these was directed by an inferior master of respectable dignity, and the whole business was dispatched by an hundred and forty-eight secretaries, chosen for the most part from the profession of the law, on account of the variety of abstracts of reports and references which frequently occurred in the exercise of their several CHAP.

* By a very stupid indolence, derived from the rusticity of the first conquerors, and remark of their household styled the child of their many women concubines. Consequently very severely reprobate to him, that his own laws, and that of the empire, must depend on the opinion, which foreign ambassadors may conceive of the plenty and magnificence of the royal table. (Varron, l. vi, epistol. 8.)

† Gualtero de Bileto, Florent. Augusti, l. ii. c. 10, p. 104 has very accurately explained the functions of the master of the offices, and the management of his subordinate serens. But he exactly erred, in the most material particular, he states from the time of the Antonines, we speak of Nero; the holder of a magistrature who would be made a literary before the reign of Constantine.

XVII.
functions. From a condescension, which in former ages would have been esteemed unworthy of the Roman majesty, a particular secretary was allowed for the Greek language; and interpreters were appointed to receive the ambassadors of the barbarians: but the department of foreign affairs, which constitutes so essential a part of modern policy, seldom diverted the attention of the master of the office. His mind was more seriously engaged by the general direction of the posts and arsenals of the empire. There were thirty-four cities, fifteen in the east, and nineteen in the west, in which regular companies of workmen were perpetually employed in fabricating defensive armour, offensive weapons of all sorts, and military engines, which were deposited in the arsenals, and occasionally delivered for the service of the troops.

§. In the course of nine centuries, the office of questor had experienced a very singular revolution. In the infancy of Rome, two inferior magistracies were annually elected by the people, to relieve the consuls from the invidious management of the public treasure;¹ a similar assistant was granted to every proconsul, and to every prætor, who exercised a military or provincial command; with the extent of conquest, the two questors were gradually multiplied to the number of four,

¹ Tacitus (Annal. vi. 27) says, that the first questors were elected by the people, thirty-four years after the foundation of the republic; but he is mistaken, that they had, long before that period, been usually appointed by the consuls, and even by the kings. But this obscure point of antiquity is covered by other matters.

CHAP.
XVII.

of eight, of twenty, and, for a short time, perhaps, of forty;* and the noblest citizens ambitiously solicited an office which gave them a seat in the senate, and a just hope of obtaining the honours of the republic. Whilst Augustus affected to maintain the freedom of election, he consented to accept the annual privilege of recommending; or rather indeed of nominating, a certain proportion of candidates; and it was his custom to select one of these distinguished youths to read his orations or epistles in the assemblies of the senate.^b The practice of Augustus was imitated by succeeding princes; the occasional commission was established as a permanent office; and the favoured quaestor, assuming a new and more illustrious character, alone survived the suppression of his ancient and useless colleagues.^c As the ora-

* Tacitus (Annal. ii. 22) seems to consider twenty as the highest number of quaestors; and Dion. (G. Rom. p. 214) insinuates that if the dictator Cato ever raised forty, it was only to facilitate the payment of an immense debt of gentiles. Yet the augmentation which he made of praetors exhibited under the succeeding reigns.

^a Sueton. in August. c. 64, and Tacitus. ad. loc. Ann. cii. p. 245.

^b The youth and inexperience of the quaestors, who entered on their important office in their twenty-fifth year (Leg. Favour. at Tacit. l. iii. 19) engaged Augustus to remove them from the management of the treasury; and though they were continued by Claudius, they seem to have been finally dismissed by Nero. (Tacit. Annal. xiii. 23. Sueton. in Aug. c. 96, in Claud. c. 24. Dion. p. 564-567, &c. Film. Epistol. x. 20, et alibi.) In the provinces of the imperial division, the plans of the government were more fully supplied by the numerous Illust. Cam. p. 709, Tacit. in Vit. Agripp. c. 16; or, as they were afterwards called, collegae. (Illust. Agripp. p. 126.) But in the provinces of the senate, we may still observe a series of quaestors till the reign of Mirous Antonia. (See the for

tions, which he composed in the name of the emperor,* acquired the force, and, at length, the form of absolute edicts, he was considered as the representative of the legislative power, the oracle of the council, and the original source of the civil jurisprudence. He was sometimes invited to take his seat in the supreme judicature of the imperial consistory, with the prætorian præfects, and the number of the officers; and he was frequently requested to resolve the doubts of inferior judges: but as he was not oppressed with a variety of subordinate business, his leisure and talents were employed to cultivate that dignified style of eloquence, which, in the corruption of taste and language, still preserves the majesty of the Roman laws.⁴ In some respects, the office of the imperial quæstor may be compared with that of a modern chancellor; but the use of a great seal, which seems to have been adopted by the illiterate reigns of Augustus, the epistles of Pliny, and a decisive fact in the Augustan history, p. 843. From Ulpian we may learn, 1 Pandect. l. 1. tit. 13, that under the government of the house of Severus, their provincial administration was abolished; and in the subsequent transition, the annual or triennial elections of quæstors must have naturally ceased.

* Quæstor potius nomine et nomine ipse distaret, et nomine suaveretur, etiamque in omni iudicio, etiam quæstori esset. Justinian in Tit. c. 8. The office must have acquired new dignity, which was sensibly elevated by the co-signature of the emperor. Justinian transferred the same care to Hedrian, his quæstor and censor. See Dodwell Pandectarum, Comment. v. vi. p. 362-374.

——— Tresviri aëna dantur;

Supplicatio rogatur. Quæstus regis.

1. Quæstor datus est; non dignus imperio.

Majestas emittitur non Romano locum.

Cædant in Cæsar, Moll. Thæstor. 23. See likewise Symonides (Epich. l. 17), and Cæcilius (Metell. ut, 30).

CHAP.
XVII.The fall
of the empire.

barbarians, was never introduced to attest the public acts of the emperors. 4. The extraordinary title of count of the sacred largesse was bestowed on the treasurer-general of the revenue, with the intention perhaps of inculcating, that every payment flowed from the voluntary bounty of the monarch. To receive the almost infinite detail of the annual and daily expence of the civil and military administration in every part of a great empire, would exceed the powers of the most vigorous imagination. The actual account employed several hundred persons, distributed into eleven different offices, which were artfully contrived to examine and controul their respective operations. The multitude of these agents had a natural tendency to increase; and it was more than once thought expedient to dismiss to their native homes the useless supernumeraries, who, deserting their honest labours, had pressed with too much eagerness into the lucrative profession of the finances.* Twenty-nine provincial receivers, of whom eighteen were honoured with the title of count, corresponded with the treasurer; and he extended his jurisdiction over the mines from whence the precious metals were extracted, over the mints, in which they were converted into the current coin, and over the public treasuries of the most important cities, where they were deposited for the service of the state. The foreign trade of the empire was regulated by this minister, who directed likewise all the linen and woollen manufactures, in which the successive operations of spinning, weaving, and dyeing, were executed, chiefly by women of a servile condition, for the use of the palace and army. Twenty-six of these institutions are enumerated in the west, where the arts had been more recently introduced, and a still larger proportion may be allowed for the industrious provinces of the east.* Besides the public revenue, which an absolute monarch might levy and expend according to his pleasure, the emperors, in the capacity of opulent citizens, possessed a very extensive property, which was administered by the comes, or treasurer of the private estate. Some part had perhaps been the ancient demesnes of kings and republics; some accessions might be derived from the families which were successively invested with the purple; but the most considerable portion flowed from the impure source of confiscations and forfeitures. The imperial estates were scattered through the provinces, from Mauritania to Britain; but the rich and fertile soil of Cappadocia tempted the monarch to acquire in that country his fairest possessions,† and either Constantine or his successors embraced the occasion of justifying avarice by religious zeal. They suppressed

* Cod. Theod. l. 12, tit. 30. Cod. Justinian. l. 12, tit. 74.

* In the departments of the two arms of the treasury, the subscriptores of the Nummi happen to be very different. It may be observed, that we had a treasury chief in London, and a governor of manufactures at Winchester. But Britain was not thought worthy either of a chief or of an arsenal. Gaul alone possessed three of the former, and eight of the latter.

† Chet. Theod. l. vi. tit. xxi, leg. 3, and Godfrey ad loc.

CHAP.
XVII.

the rich temple of Comana, where the high-priest of the goddess of war supported the dignity of a sovereign prince: and they applied to their private use the consecrated lands, which were inhabited by six thousand subjects or slaves of the deity and her ministers.^a But these were not the valuable inhabitants: the plains that stretch from the foot of Mount Argæus to the banks of the Sarus, bred a generous race of horses, renowned above all others in the ancient world, for their majestic shape, and incomparable swiftness. These sacred animals, destined for the service of the palace and the imperial games, were protected by the laws from the profanation of a vulgar master.^b The demesnes of Cappadocia were important enough to require the inspection of a count;^c officers of an inferior rank were stationed in the other parts of the empire; and the deputies of the private, as well as those of the public, treasury, were maintained in the exercise of their independent functions, and encouraged to con-

^a Strabo. Geography. l. xii. p. 403. The other temple of Comana, in Pontus, was a colony from that of Cappadocia. l. xii. p. 404. The geographer (see Bochart's Asie Sacrée, tom. ii. p. 35) conjectures that the deity adored in both Comanae was Rhea, the Venus of the west, the goddess of generation; a very different being looked upon the goddess of war.

^b Strabo. l. x. c. iii. §. 10. de Orge Dindorf. Celsus has collected every circumstance of antiquity relative to the Cappadocian horses. One of the finest breeds, the Polosæna, was the favourite of a rebel, whose name he gives; whose name Grot. Tychs, near the great road between Constantinople and Antioch.

^c Strabo. l. xii. c. 10. subjected the governors of the count of Cappadocia to the immediate authority of the directing senate, who presided over the sacred institutions.

from the authority of the provincial magistrates.[†] CHAP. XXII.
 6, 7. The chosen bands of cavalry and infantry, The names of the divisions.
 which guarded the person of the emperor, were under the immediate command of the two counts of the domestics. The whole number consisted of three thousand five hundred men, divided into seven schools, or troops, of five hundred each; and in the east, this honourable service was almost entirely appropriated to the Armenians. Whenever, on public ceremonies, they were drawn up in the courts and porticoes of the palace, their lofty stature, silent order, and splendid arms of silver and gold, displayed a martial pomp, not unworthy of the Roman majesty.* From the seven schools two companies of horse and foot were selected, of the protectors, whose advantageous station was the hope and reward of the most deserving soldiers. They mounted guard in the interior apartments, and were occasionally dispatched into the provinces, to execute with celerity and vigour the orders of their master.† The counts of the domestics had succeeded to the office of the prætorian præfects; like the præfects, they retired from the service of the palace to the command of armies.

† Cod. Theod. l. vi. tit. xlv. leg. 3. &c.

* Pausanias, p. 102-103. The appearance of these military divisions is described in the Latin poem of Corippus de Laudibus Justin. l. iii. 377-479. P. 318-429 of the Symplicii Hist. Byzantinæ. Rem. 177.

† Ammianus Marcellinus, who lived in many years, survived only the rank of a prætorian. The first ten among these honourable soldiers were Christian.

CHAP.
XVII.

Agents of official spies.

The perpetual intercourse between the court and the provinces was facilitated by the construction of roads and the institution of posts. But these beneficial establishments were accidentally connected with a pernicious and intolerable abuse. Two or three hundred agents or messengers were employed, under the jurisdiction of the master of the offices, to announce the names of the annual consuls, and the edicts or victories of the emperor. They insensibly assumed the licence of reporting whatever they could observe of the conduct either of magistrates or of private citizens; and were soon considered as the eyes of the monarch,* and the scourge of the people. Under the warm influence of a feeble reign, they multiplied to the incredible number of ten thousand, disdained the mild though frequent admonitions of the laws, and exercised in the profitable management of the posts a rapacious and insolent oppression. These official spies, who regularly corresponded with the palace, were encouraged, by favour and reward, anxiously to watch the progress of every treasonable design, from the faint and latent symptoms of disaffection, to the actual preparation of an open revolt. Their careless or criminal violation of truth and justice was covered by the consecrated mask of zeal; and they might securely aim their poisoned arrows at the breast either of the guilty or the innocent, who had provoked their resentment, or refused to purchase their silence. A faithful subject, of Syria perhaps, or of Britain, was exposed to the danger, or at least to the dread, of being dragged in chains, to the court of Milan or Constantinople, to defend his life and fortune against the malicious charge of these privileged informers. The ordinary administration was conducted by those methods which extreme necessity can alone palliate; and the defects of evidence were diligently supplied by the use of torture.^{CHAP. XVII.}

* Memphis, Cyrenes, &c. de Rebus Persicis, &c. Nov. 1760, p. 244. The emperor Abasid took pleasure (his Persian, memshad).

The deceitful and dangerous experiment of the criminal question, as it is emphatically styled, was admitted, rather than approved, in the jurisprudence of the Romans. They applied this sanguinary mode of examination only to servile bodies, whose sufferings were seldom weighed by those haughty republicans in the scale of justice or humanity; but they would never consent to violate the sacred person of a citizen, till they possessed the clearest evidence of his guilt.^{USE OF LAW.} The annals of tyranny, from the reign of Tiberius to that of Domitian, circumstantially relate the executions of many innocent victims; but, as long as the faintest remembrance was kept alive

* For the Apotele in Rebus, see Ammonius l. xii. c. 2, l. xli. c. 2, xlii. c. 7, with the various translations of Valentin. God. Theod. l. vi. tit. xxi. xxii. xxiii. Among the passages collected in the Commentary of Grotius, the most remarkable one is from Libanius, in his discourse concerning the death of Julian.

† The Pandects l. xliii. tit. xlvii. contain the sentiments of the most celebrated civilians on the subject of tortures. They strictly confine it to slaves; and Ulpian himself is ready to acknowledge, that the est flagella, et verberum, et glæ criminalis fall.

CHAS.
EVIL

of the national freedom and honour, the last hours of a Roman were secure from the danger of ignominious torture.* The conduct of the provincial magistrates was not, however, regulated by the practice of the city, or the strict maxims of the civilians. They found the use of torture established not only among the slaves of oriental despotism, but among the Macedonians, who obeyed a limited monarch; among the Rhodians, who flourished by the liberty of commerce; and even among the wise Athenians, who had asserted and adorned the dignity of human kind.† The acquiescence of the provincials encouraged their governors to acquire, or perhaps to usurp, a discretionary power of employing the rack, to extort from vagrants or plebeian criminals the confession of their guilt, till they insensibly proceeded to confound the distinction of rank, and to disregard the privileges of Roman citizens. The apprehensions of the subjects urged them to solicit, and the interest of the sovereign engaged him to grant, a variety of special exemptions, which tacitly allowed, and even authorised, the general use of torture. They protected all persons of illustrious or honourable rank, bishops

⁷ In the conspiracy of Pius against Nero, Epicharmus (Hermeneutae) was the only person mentioned; the rest were silent spectators. It would be dangerous to doubt it, and it would be difficult to find a stronger example. Tacit. Annal. vi, 41.

Deiorem — de Institutis Atheniensibus. Bachelorum, declaracione habuerunt, quod quoniam illi de quod scilicet illorum Illi, clausura arguerent. Causa. Finit. Causa. 24. We may learn from the trial of Phidias the position of the Macrones.
(Diodor Sicul. 2. 24. p. 204. Q. Caus. 2. 24. 115)

and their presbyters, professors of the liberal arts, CHAP.
XVII.
soldiers and their families, municipal officers, and their posterity to the third generation, and all children under the age of puberty.⁵ But a fatal maxim was introduced into the new jurisprudence of the empire, that in the case of treason, which included every offence that the subtlety of lawyers could derive from an hostile intention towards the prince or republic,⁶ all privileges were suspended, and all conditions were reduced to the same ignominious level. As the safety of the emperor was avowedly preferred to every consideration of justice or humanity, the dignity of age, and the tenderness of youth, were alike exposed to the most cruel tortures; and the terrors of a malicious information, which might select them as the accomplices, or even as the witnesses, perhaps, of an imaginary crime, perpetually hung over the heads of the principal citizens of the Roman world.⁷

These evils, however terrible they may appear, PANDECTS were confined to the smaller number of Roman

⁵ Hæmerling (Comment. Jur. Civil. part vii. p. 81) has collected these exemptions into one view.

⁶ This definition of the crimen Treason (Pandect. l. clym. tit. vii.) seems to have been adopted in the statuta of Caracalla, rather than in that of Alexander Severus. See the Code of Theodosius and Justinian ad leg. Julianam de pœstibus.

⁷ Arædine Charisius in the salutis treason quoted in the Pandects by joining the universal practice of testatur in all cases of treason; but this maxim of testatur, which is admitted by Ambrosius (l. xix. c. lxx.) with the most respectful terror, is enforced by several laws of the Agrographi of Constantine. See Code Theod. l. ix. tit. lxxv. in reprehensibilibus criminibus omnes et omnes.

CHAP.
XVII.

subjects, whose dangerous situation was in some degree compensated by the enjoyment of those advantages, either of nature or of fortune, which exposed them to the jealousy of the monarch. The obscure millions of a great empire have much less to dread from the cruelty than from the avarice of their masters: and their humble happiness is principally affected by the grievance of excessive taxes, which greatly pressing on the wealthy, demand with accelerated weight on the meaner and more indigent classes of society. An ingenious philosopher* has calculated the universal measure of the public impositions by the degrees of freedom and servitude; and ventures to assert, that, according to an invariable law of nature, it must always increase with the former, and diminish in a just proportion to the latter. But this reflection, which would tend to alleviate the miseries of despotism, is contradicted at least by the history of the Roman empire; which accuses the same princes of despoiling the senate of its authority, and the provinces of their wealth. Without abolishing all the various customs and duties on merchandizes, which are imperceptibly discharged by the apparent choice of the purchaser, the policy of Constantine and his successors preferred a simple and direct mode of taxation, more congenial to the spirit of an arbitrary government.[†]

* Montesquieu, Esprit des Loix, l. iii., c. 12.

† Mr. Hume (Rome, vol. ii. p. 389) has seen this important truth, with some degree of perplexity.

The name and use of the edictum,^a which CHAP.
XVII. served to ascertain the chronology of the middle ages, were derived from the regular practice of the Roman tribunes. The emperor subscribed with his own hand, and in purple ink, the solemn edict, or bullition, which was fixed up in the principal city of each diocese, during two months previous to the first day of September. And, by a very easy transposition of ideas, the word indiction was transferred to the measure of tribute which it prescribed, and to the annual term which it allowed for the payment. This general estimate of the supplies was proportional to the real and imaginary wants of the state: but as often as the expenses exceeded the revenues of the revenue fell short of the compulsion, an additional tax, under the name of expeditionis, was imposed on the people, and the most valuable attribute of sovereignty was communicated to the prætorian præ-fects, who, on some occasions, were permitted to provide for the unforeseen and extraordinary exigencies of the public service. The execution of these laws (which it would be tedious to pursue in ^a The cycle of indictiones, which may be traced as high as the reign of Constantine, or perhaps of his father Constantius, is still employed by the vulgar world: but the commencement of the year has since long since receded to the last of January. See *Chron.

de Vindob. de Episc.* p. 461 and Histor. de Indictione de la Haye nouvelle, tom. II. p. 221 two ancient testaments, which came from the workshop of the transcribers.

^b The Tabulæ Indictionis or Tabulæ of the various books of the Transcription Cycle are filled with the chronological regulations on the important subject of tributes, but they suppose a slender knowledge of fundamental principles than it is at present in our power to attain.

CHAP.
XVII.

their minute and intricate detail) consisted of two distinct operations: the resolving the general imposition into its constituent parts, which were assessed on the provinces, the cities, and the individuals of the Roman world: and the collecting the separate contributions of the individuals, the cities, and the provinces, till the accumulated sums were poured into the imperial treasury. But as the account between the monarch and the subject was perpetually open, and as the renewal of the demand anticipated the perfect discharge of the preceding obligation, the weighty machine of the finances was moved by the same hands round the circle of its yearly revolution. Whatever was honourable or important in the administration of the revenue, was committed to the wisdom of the prefects, and their provincial representatives: the lucrative functions were claimed by a crowd of subordinate officers, some of whom depended on the treasurer, others on the governor of the province: and who, in the inevitable conflicts of a perplexed jurisdiction, had frequent opportunities of disputing with each other the spoils of the people. The laborious officers, which could be productive only of envy and reproach, of expense and danger, were imposed on the decurions, who formed the corporations of the cities, and whom the severity of the imperial laws had condemned to sustain the burdens of civil society.* The whole landed property of the empire (without excepting the patrimonial estates of the monarch) was the object of ordinary taxation; and every new purchaser contracted the obligations of the former proprietor. An accurate census,* or survey, was the only equitable mode of ascertaining the proportion which every citizen should be obliged to contribute for the public service; and from the well-known period of the indictio, there is reason to believe that this difficult and expensive operation was repeated at the regular distance of fifteen years. The lands were measured by surveyors, who were sent into the provinces; their nature, whether arable or pasture, or vineyards or woods, was distinctly reported; and an estimate was made of their common value from the average produce of five years. The numbers of slaves and of cattle constituted an essential part of the report; an oath was administered to the proprietors, which bound them to disclose the true state of their affairs; and their attempts to pervert, or elude the intention of the legislator, were severely watched, and punished as a capital crime, which included the double guilt of treason and sacrilege.† A large portion of the tribute

* This rule, concerning the decuriones (l. 12, 13, 14) is the most striking in the whole Theodosian Code: it does it certainly not say that our hundred and seventy-two district towns to maintain the duties and privileges of that feudal order of chibans.

* Histories given at biennial intervals, and which were, at regular sessions, reviewed in Comitia. Vol. viii. p. 10. See Col. Theod. l. viii. c. 4, 5, 6, with Constantine's Commentary.

† Super sacrilegio seems like sacrilege, and adversum Romanum (not adversus), signifies against Roman Government, or against the public property of the empire, more than adversus against public rebellion, or being open to civil war against it. Col. Theod. l. viii. tit. vi. leg. 1. Although the law is not without its stated severity, it is, however, strong to prove the intention of the legislator, and the disposition of the penalty.

CHAP.
XVII.

was paid in money, and of the current coin of the empire, gold alone could be legally accepted.¹ The remainder of the taxes, according to the proportions determined by the annual indiction, was furnished in a manner still more direct, and still more oppressive. According to the different nature of lands, their real produce, in the various articles of wine or oil, corn or barley, wood or iron, was transported by the labourer or at the expense of the proprietor to the imperial magazines, from whence they were occasionally distributed, for the use of the court, of the army, and of the two capitals, Rome and Constantinople. The commissioners of the revenue were so frequently obliged to make considerable purchases, that they were strictly prohibited from allowing any compensation, or from receiving in money the value of those supplies which were exacted in kind. In the primitive simplicity of small communities, this method may be well adapted to collect the almost voluntary offerings of the people; but it is at once susceptible of the utmost latitude and of the utmost strictness, which in a corrupt and absolute monarchy must introduce a perpetual contest between the power of oppression and the arts of fraud.² The agriculture of the

¹ The prohibition of Flavius would have opened a violent military as well as political argument against imperial coinage. But Flavius lived; 12.

² Some provisions were taken (see Cod. Theod. l. vi. tit. 12. and Cod. Justinian. l. x. tit. 12. §. 1. §. 2. §. 3. to restrain the magistrates from the abuse of their authority, either by the extortion or in the purchase of taxes; but those who had learning enough to

Roman provinces was miserably ruined, and, in the progress of despotism, which tends to disappoint its own purpose, the emperors were obliged to derive some merit from the forgiveness of debts, or the remission of tributes, which their subjects were utterly incapable of paying. According to the new division of Italy, the fertile and happy province of Campania, the scene of the early victories and of the delicious retirements of the citizens of Rome, extended between the sea and the Appennine from the Tyber to the Silarus. Within sixty years after the death of Constantine, and on the evidence of an actual survey, an exemption was granted in favour of three hundred and thirty thousand English acres of desert and uncultivated land; which amounted to one-eighth of the whole surface of the province. As the footsteps of the barbarians had not yet been seen in Italy, the cause of this amazing desolation, which is recorded in the laws, can be ascribed only to the administration of the Roman emperors.¹

Either from design or from accident, the mode of despotism seemed to unite the substance of a

Assisted in the form of a capital city.

read the constitution of China against Venice, and the Frenchman sought internal dissensions in all the various acts of oppression, with regard to the weight, the price, the quantity, and the exchange. The extent of the aristocratical power would supply the argument of property is evident.

¹ Claud. Ptolemy, l. 2, c. 11, the Varron, l. 2, c. 2, published the facts of Marcellus, a. d. 103, by the emperor Hadrian, only two months after the death of his father Trajan. He speaks of 325,045 Roman jugera, which I have reduced to the English measure. The jugerum contained 17 1/2 square Roman feet.

CHAP.
XVII.

land tax with the form of a capitation.⁴ The returns which were sent of every province or district, expressed the number of tributary subjects, and the amount of the public impositions. The latter of these sums was divided by the former; and the estimate, that such a province contained so many capita, or heads of tribute; and that each head was rated at such a price, was universally received, not only in the popular, but even in the legal computation. The value of a tributary head must have varied, according to many accidental, or at least fluctuating circumstances: but some knowledge has been preserved of a very curious fact, the more important, since it relates to one of the richest provinces of the Roman empire, and which now flourishes as the most splendid of the European kingdoms. The rapacious ministers of Constantius had exhausted the wealth of Gaul, by exacting twenty-five pieces of gold for the annual tribute of every head. The humane policy of his successor reduced the capitation to seven pieces.⁵ A moderate proportion between these opposite extremes of extravagant oppression and of transient indulgence, may therefore be fixed at sixteen pieces of gold, at about nine pounds sterling, the common standard perhaps of the impositions of God.* But this calculation, or rather indeed the facts from whence it is deduced, cannot fail of suggesting two difficulties to a thinking mind, who will be at once surprised by the equality, and by the enormity of the capitation. An attempt to explain them may perhaps reflect some light on the interesting subject of the finances of the declining empire.

⁴ Godefray (Hist. Theod. tom. vi. p. 116) agrees with weights and measures on the subject of the capitation; but while he explains the report, as a share or estimate of property, he too absolutely excludes the idea of a personal assessment.

⁵ Quid proinde salutem: subactum extrema perit Gallia, hinc maxime claret, quod primitiva partes est deprecatum, pro capite solidis tributi maxime vicinis quintum ante sepositi legimus: deinde vero septuaginta solidis universa complectitur. Amm. Mar. l. xvi. c. 6.

1. It is obvious, that, as long as the immutable constitution of human nature produces and maintains so unequal a division of property, the most numerous part of the community would be deprived of their subsistence, by the equal assessment of a tax from which the sovereign would derive a very trifling revenue. Such indeed might be the theory of the Roman capitation: but in the practice, this unjust equality was no longer

* In the estimation of any kind of money under Constantine and his successors, we must only refer to the constant standard of Mr. Greaves on the Denarius, for the pound of the following principles: 1. That the heaviest and heaviest Roman pound, containing 5236 grains of Troy weight, is about one twelfth lighter than the English pound, which is composed of 5160 of the same grains: 2. That the pound of gold, which had once been divided into forty-eight ounces, was so, (the three silver and silver-gilt ounces being more of the same denomination): 3. That one of these ounces was the legal tender for a pound of silver, and that consequently the pound of gold was exchanged for fourteen pounds eight ounces of silver, according to the Roman, or about thirteen pounds according to the English, weight: 4. That the English pound of silver is valued into forty-two shillings. From these elements we may compute the Roman pound of gold, the most method of valuing these sums, at forty pounds sterling, and we may fix the measure of the aureus at somewhat more than twenty shillings.

CHAP.
XVII.

felt, as the tribute was collected on the principle of a real, not of a personal imposition. Several indigent citizens contributed to compose a single head, or share of taxation; while the wealthy provincial, in proportion to his fortune, alone represented several of those imaginary beings. In a poetical request, addressed to one of the last and most deserving of the Roman princes who reigned in Gaul, Sidonius Appollinaris personifies his tribute under the figure of a triple monster, the Geryon of the Grecian fables, and intrudes the new Hercules that he would most graciously be pleased to save his life by cutting off three of his heads.^a The fortune of Sidonius far exceeded the customary wealth of a poet; but if he had pursued the allusion, he must have painted many of the Gallic nobles with the hundred heads of the deadly Hydra, spreading over the face of the country, and devouring the substance of an hundred families. 11. The difficulty of allowing an annual sum of about nine pounds sterling, even for the average of the capitation of Gaul, may be rendered more evident by the comparison of the present state of the same country, as it is now governed by the absolute monarch of an industrious, wealthy, and affectionate people. The taxes of France cannot be magnified, either by fear or by

^a Geryonem tres capita habent, unum est illud.

— Ille caput in regem, in regem mille fides.

— Idem, Appollinaris, l. viii. 200.

The repetition of Vatier himself led me to critical nice examination, thus I have added to my note (p. 144) an 'this remarkable passage. The words, tre capite mean, betray the plurality of the capitation.

flattery, beyond the annual amount of eighteen millions sterling, which ought perhaps to be shared among four-and-twenty millions of inhabitants. Seven millions of these, in the capacity of fathers, or brothers, or husbands, may discharge the obligations of the remaining multitudes of women and children; yet the equal proportion of each tributary subject will scarcely rise above fifty shillings of our money, instead of a proportion almost four times as considerable, which was regularly imposed on their Gallic ancestors. The reason of this difference may be found, not so much in the relative scarcity or plenty of gold and silver, as in the different state of society in ancient Gaul and in modern France. In a country where personal freedom is the privilege of every subject, the whole mass of taxes, whether they are levied on property or on consumption, may be fairly divided among the whole

CHAP.
XVII.

* This province, however, considerable as was once, is reduced to the most indigent and beggarly state, and is almost entirely depopulated by public authority, and now dependent on the Count of Flanders. The annual produce of births, throughout the whole kingdom, taken in five years from 1773 to 1777, has amounted to 16,810,949 births, and 449,240 girls, in all 17,260,189 children. The province of French Flanders alone furnishes 2000 families and we are indebted, by an actual enumeration of the people, annually reported from the year 1717 to the year 1774, that upon an average, Flanders sustains 247,402 inhabitants. By the value of this analogy, we might infer that the ordinary proportion of annual births for the whole kingdom is about 1 to 10, and that the kingdom of France sustains 16,131,000 persons of both sexes and of every age. If we compare numbers with the same moderate proportion of 1 to 10, the whole population will amount to 16,131,000. From the diligent recollection of the French government, which are not less worthy of our admiration, we may hope to obtain a still greater degree of accuracy in the universal subject.

CHAP. body of the nation. But the far greater part of XVII. the lands of ancient Gaul, as well as of the other provinces of the Roman world, were cultivated by slaves, or by peasants, whose dependent condition was a less rigid servitude.⁸ In such a state the poor were maintained at the expence of the masters, who enjoyed the fruits of their labour; and as the rolls of tribute were filled only with the names of those citizens who possessed the means of an honourable, or at least of a decent subsistence, the comparative smallness of their numbers explains and justifies the high rate of their capitation. The truth of this assertion may be illustrated by the following example. The Aedui, one of the most powerful and civilized tribes or cities of Gaul, occupied an extent of territory which now contains above five hundred thousand inhabitants, in the two ecclesiastical dioceses of Autun and Nevers;⁹ and with the

⁸ Cod. Theod. l. v. tit. ix. c. xi. Cod. Justinian. l. xi. tit. xiii. Coloni appellati sunt qui conditionem servorum gerunt solum, propriam ageruntur, sed dominis possidentur. Agostin. de Civitate Dei, l. x. c. 1.

⁹ The ancient jurisdiction of (L'episcopal) Autun (or Bourgony, the capital of the Aedui, comprehended the adjacent territory of (Metropolitan) Nevers. See L'histoire, Notice de l'ancienne Gaule, p. 49). The two dioceses of Autun and Nevers are now composed, the former of 910, and the latter of 100 parishes. The registers of births, taken during eleven years, in 418 parishes of the same province of Burgundy, and multiplied by the arithmetic proportion of 25 (see Meymaier's Dissertation sur la Population, p. 142), not adjusted as to weight to average number of 616 persons for each parish, which being upon multiplication by the 710 parishes of the dioceses of Nevers and Autun, will produce the sum of 362,120 persons for the total of country, which was then possessed by the Aedui.

probable accession of those of Châlons and Metz, the population would amount to eight hundred thousand souls. In the time of Constantine, the territory of the Afdai afforded no more than twenty-five thousand heads of capitation, of whom seven thousand were discharged by that prince from the intolerable weight of tribute.* A just analogy would seem to countenance the opinion of an ingenious historian,† that the free and tributary citizens did not surpass the number of half a million; and if, in the ordinary administration of government, their annual payments may be computed at about four millions and a half of our money, it would appear, that although the share of each individual was four times as considerable, a fourth part only of the modern taxes of France was levied on the imperial province of Gaul. The exactions of Constantius may be calculated at seven millions sterling, which were reduced to two millions by the humanity or the wisdom of Julian.

* We might derive an additional supply of 300,000 inhabitants from the citizens of Châlons (Cabalonus) and of Metz (Metens); since they contain, the one 500, and the other 200, parishes. The extension of territory might be justified by very specious reasons. 1. Châlons and Metz were undoubtedly within the original jurisdiction of the Afdai. (See d'Alelle's Notice, p. 145-146.) 2. In the Notices of Gaul, they are recommended as at Constantine, but never by an Emperor. 3. They do not appear to have been separated until between the fifth and sixth centuries. Yet there is a passage in Eusebius (Paragon, Vol. viii. 7) which very positively denies the fact, attributing the territory of the Afdai to the reign of Constantine along the beautiful banks of the northern Rhine.

† Exposition de Paragon, Vol. viii. 11.

‡ Annales de l'Empire Romain, de M. F. page 6, p. 171.

CHAP.
XVII.

Capitation on trade and industry.

BUT this tax, or capitation, on the proprietors of land, would have suffered a rich and numerous class of free citizens to escape. With the view of drawing that species of wealth which is derived from art or labour, and which exists in money or in merchandize, the emperors imposed a distinct and personal tribute on the trading part of their subjects.* Some exemptions, very strictly confined both in time and place, were allowed to the proprietors who disposed of the produce of their own estates. Some indulgence was granted to the profession of the liberal arts: but every other branch of commercial industry was affected by the severity of the law. The honourable merchant of Alexandria, who imported the gems and spices of India for the use of the western world; the usurer, who derived from the interest of money a silent and ignominious profit; the ingenious manufacturer, the diligent mechanic, and even the most obscure retailer of a sequestered village, were obliged to admit the officers of the revenue into the partnership of their gain: and the sovereign of the Roman empire, who tolerated the profession, consented to share the infamous salary of public prostitutes. As this general taxation industry was collected every fourth year, it was styled the biennial contribution; and the historian Zosimus† laments that the approach of the fatal period was announced by the tears and terrors of the citizens, who were often compelled by the impending scourge to embrace the most abhorred and unnatural methods of procuring the sum at which their property had been assessed. The testimony of Zosimus cannot indeed be justified from the charge of passion and prejudice; but, from the nature of this tribute, it seems reasonable to conclude, that it was arbitrary in the distribution, and extremely rigorous in the mode of collecting. The secret wealth of commerce, and the precarious profits of art or labour, are susceptible only of a discretionary valuation, which is seldom disadvantageous to the interest of the treasury; and as the person of the trader supplies the want of a visible and permanent security, the payment of the imposition, which in the case of a land-tax, may be obtained by the seizure of property, can rarely be extorted by any other means than those of corporal punishments. The cruel treatment of the insolvent debtors of the state, is attested, and was perhaps mitigated, by a very humane edict of Constantine, who, disclaiming the use of racks and of scourges, allots a spacious and airy prison for the place of their confinement.*

* See Paul. Tacit. l. xii. tit. l. ii.

† Zosimus, l. ii. p. 114. There is probably as much passion and prejudice in the attack of Zosimus, as in the statement of the infamy of Commodus by the credulous Dr. Hume. Hist. of the Emper. vol. ii. p. 20.

These general taxes were imposed and levied by the absolute authority of the monarchy; but the occasional offerings of the coronary gold still retained the name and semblance of popular consent. It was an ancient custom that the allies of the republic, who ascribed their safety or deliver-

* Cod. Theod. l. vi. tit. vii. leg. 2.

CHAP.
XVII

since to the success of the Roman arms; and even the cities of Italy, who admired the virtues of their victorious general, adorned the pomp of his triumph by their voluntary gifts of crowns of gold, which, after the ceremony, were consecrated in the temple of Jupiter, to remain a lasting monument of his glory to future ages. The progress of zeal and flattery soon multiplied the number, and increased the size, of these popular donations; and the triumph of Cæsar was enriched with two thousand eight hundred and twenty-two massy crowns, whose weight amounted to twenty thousand four hundred and fourteen pounds of gold. This treasure was immediately melted down by the prudent dictator, who was satisfied that it would be more serviceable to his soldiers than to the gods; his example was imitated by his successors; and the custom was introduced, of exchanging these splendid ornaments for the more acceptable present of the current gold coin of the empire.* The spontaneous offering was at length exacted as the debt of duty; and instead of being confined to the occasion of a triumph, it was supposed to be granted by the several cities and provinces of the monarchy, as often as the emperor condescended to announce his accession, his consulship, the birth of a son, the creation of a Cæsar, a victory over the barbarians, or any other real or imaginary event which graced the annals of his reign. The peculiar free gift of the senate of Rome was fixed by custom at sixteen hundred pounds of gold, or about sixty-four thousand pounds sterling. The oppressed subjects celebrated their own felicity, that their sovereign should graciously consent to accept this feeble but voluntary testimony of their loyalty and gratitude.*

* See Lipsius de Magnitud. Romanæ, l. ii. c. 5. The Tetrarches again presented the emperor Claudius with a gown of gold of wool, and Galla with another of silk, several pounds weight.

Soon followed the repeal of the constitution of Lipsæus.

CHAP.
XVII.

A people elated by pride, or soured by discontent, are seldom qualified to form a just estimate of their actual situation. The subjects of Constantine were incapable of discerning the decline of genius and manly virtue, which so far degraded them below the dignity of their ancestors; but they could feel and lament the rage of tyranny, the relaxation of discipline, and the increase of taxes. The impartial historian, who acknowledges the justice of their complaints, will observe some favourable circumstances which tended to alleviate the misery of their condition. The threatening tempest of barbarians, which so soon subverted the foundations of Roman greatness, was still repelled, or suspended, on the frontiers. The arts of luxury and literature were cultivated, and the elegant pleasures of society were enjoyed, by the inhabitants of a considerable portion of the globe. The forms, the pomp, and the expence, of the civil administration contributed to restrain the irregular licence of the soldiers; and although the laws were violated by

Con-
stantine

* Ant. Theod. l. vii. c. 14. The senators were supposed to be exempt from the Aurae Consecration: but the Aurum Obsequiale, which was required at their death, was precisely of the same nature.

CHAP.
XVII

power, or perverted by subtlety, the sage principles of the Roman jurisprudence preserved a sense of order and equity, unknown to the despotic governments of the east. The rights of mankind might derive some protection from religion and philosophy; and the name of freedom, which could no longer alarm, might sometimes admonish, the successors of Augustus, that they did not reign over a nation of slaves or barbarians.*

* The great Theodosius, in his judicious advice to his son, (Chronicon in le Comptes: Hincert), 114, has distinguished the station of a Roman prince from that of a Parthian monarch. Warner was necessary for the one; Mith might suffice for the other.

CHAP. XVIII.

Character of Constantine—Gothic war—Death of Constantine—Division of the empire among his three sons—Persian war—Tragic death of Constantine the younger and Constans—Corruption of Magnentius—Civil war—Victory of Constantius.

THE character of the prince who removed the seat of empire, and introduced such important changes into the civil and religious constitution of his country, has fixed the attention, and divided the opinions, of mankind. By the grateful zeal of the christians, the deliverer of the church has been decorated with every attribute of a hero, and even of a saint; while the discontent of the vanquished party has compared Constantine to the most abhorred of those tyrants, who, by their vice and weakness, dishonoured the imperial purple. The same passions have in some degree been perpetuated to succeeding generations, and the character of Constantine is considered, even in the present age, as an object either of satire or of panegyric. By the impartial union of those defects which are confessed by his warmest admirers, and of those virtues which are acknowledged by his most implacable enemies, we might hope to delineate a just portrait of that extraordinary man, which the truth and candour of history should adopt without a

CHAP.
XVIII.

Character of Constantine the Younger

CHAP.
XVIII.

continued

blush.^a But it would soon appear, that the vain attempt to blend such discordant colours, and to reconcile such inconsistent qualities, must produce a figure monstrous rather than human, unless it is viewed in its proper and distinct lights, by a careful separation of the different periods of the reign of Constantine.

His character.

The person, as well as the mind, of Constantine had been enriched by nature with her choicest endowments. His stature was lofty, his countenance majestic, his deportment graceful; his strength and activity were displayed in every manly exercise, and from his earliest youth, to a very advanced season of life, he preserved the vigour of his constitution by a strict adherence to the domestic virtues of chastity and temperance. He delighted in the social intercourse of familiar conversation: and though he might sometimes indulge his disposition to raillery with less reserve than was required by the severe dignity of his station, the courtesy and liberality of his manners gained the hearts of all who approached him. The sincerity of his friendship has been suspected; yet he shewed, on some occasions, that he was not incapable of a warm and lasting attachment. The disadvantage of an illiterate education had not prevented him from forming a just estimate of the value of learning; and the arts and sciences derived some encouragement from the munificent protection of Constantine. In the dispatch of business, his diligence was indefatigable; and the active powers of his mind were almost continually exercised in reading, writing, or meditating, in giving audience to ambassadors, and in examining the complaints of his subjects. Even those who censured the propriety of his measures were compelled to acknowledge, that he possessed magnanimity to conceive, and patience to execute, the most arduous designs, without being checked either by the prejudices of education, or by the clamours of the multitude. In the field, he infused his own intrepid spirit into the troops, whom he conducted with the talents of a consummate general; and to his abilities, rather than to his fortune, we may ascribe the signal victories which he obtained over the foreign and domestic foes of the republic. He loved glory, as the reward, perhaps as the motive, of his labours. The boundless ambition, which, from the moment of his accepting the purple at York, appears as the ruling passion of his soul, may be justified by the dangers of his own situation, by the character of his rivals, by the consciousness of superior merit, and by the prospect that his success would enable him to restore peace and order to the distracted empire. In his civil wars against Maxentius and Licinius, he had engaged on his side the inclinations of the people, who compared the undisciplined vices of those tyrants, with the spirit of wisdom and justice which seemed CHAP. XVIII. to direct the general tenor of the administration of Constantine.^a

^a On the 26th of September, 313, the Emperor Constantine, on request, sent his edict to the bishops, at which he then was at Zewara. See the History of the Emperors, tom. iii. p. 222. Eusebius and Zosimus agree in the true estimate of his character and temper. The latter, however, is more severely expressed by these writers, whose character is likewise very truly improved by the influence of their religious zeal.

FROM THE HIST. GREG.

Had Constantine fallen on the banks of the Tyber, or even in the plains of Hadrianople, such is the character which, with a few exceptions, he might have transmitted to posterity. But the conclusion of his reign (according to the moderate and indeed tender sentence of a writer of the same age) degraded him from the rank which he had acquired among the most deserving of the Roman princes.* In the life of Augustus, we behold the tyrant of the republic, converted, almost by imperceptible degrees, into the father of his country and of human kind. In that of Constantine, we may contemplate a hero, who had so long inspired his subjects with love, and his enemies with terror, degenerating into a cruel and dissolute monarch, corrupted by his fortune, or raised by conquest above the necessity of dissimulation. The general peace which he maintained during the last fourteen years of his reign,

^a The statues of Constantine are well known for the most part from Eusebius, and the younger Vales, two ancient pagans, who wrote after the extinction of his family. Euseb. Constantin. and the Bayesian Index, acknowledge his personal courage and military achievements.

* See Eusebius, v. c. In pelago Insuper imparet spiritus principis, ultimum nimis comprehensio. "From the ancient Greek version of Pausanias (edit. Harlescamp. p. 381), Euseb. himself is aware that Constantine had originally without scruple; and that the effusive amiable was dropped by the cold insensibility of transactions. Another Vales expresses the general opinion by a violent and indeed abusive phrase. Terribilis domus, quæ præstantissimæ et gloriosissimæ imperatoribus habet; deinde in tantis populis et in tantis provinciis.

was a period of apparent splendour rather than of real prosperity; and the old age of Constantine was disgraced by the opposite yet reconcilable vices of rapaciousness and prodigality. The accumulated treasures found in the palaces of Maxentius and Licinius, were lavishly consumed; the various innovations introduced by the conqueror were attended with an increasing expence; the cost of his buildings, his court, and his festivals, required an immediate and plentiful supply; and the oppression of the people was the only fund which could support the magnificence of the sovereign.⁵ His unworthy favourites, enriched by the boundless liberality of their master, usurped with impunity the privilege of rapine and corruption.⁶ A secret but universal decay was felt in every part of the public administration; and the emperor himself, though he still retained the obedience, gradually lost the esteem, of his subjects. The dress and manners, which, towards the decline of life, he chose to affect, served only to degrade him in the eyes of mankind. The Asiatic pomp, which had been adopted by the pride of Diocletian, assumed an air of softness and effeminacy in the person of Constantine. He

CHAP.
XVIII.

⁵ Idem, l. vii. c. 3. In a following discourse pronounced before the use of Cassiodorus, and Gregory, p. 222. Idem, p. 114, 115. The vanity buildings of Commodilla, &c. may be regarded as a lasting and unexceptionable proof of the profusion of their riches.

⁶ The Imperial Armenian discourse, all was profusion. Constantine broke against private wealth. Constantine, l. vii. c. 8. Constantine himself confirms the same (l. vii. c. 10, Constantine, l. vii. c. 20, 21) and some of the Imperial laws fully point out the luxury. See also, p. 22 of this volume.

CHAP.
XVIII.

is represented with false hair of various colours, laboriously arranged by the skilful artists of the times; a diadem of a new and more expensive fashion: a profusion of gems and pearls, of earrings and bracelets, and a variegated flowing robe of silk, most curiously embroidered with flowers of gold. In such apparel, scarcely to be excused by the youth and folly of Elagabalus, we are at a loss to discover the wisdom of an aged monarch, and the simplicity of a Roman veteran.^a A mind thus relaxed by prosperity and indulgence, was incapable of rising to that magnanimity which disdains suspicion, and dares to forgive. The deaths of Maximian and Licinius may perhaps be justified by the maxims of policy, as they are taught in the schools of tyrants; but an impartial narrative of the executions, or rather murders, which sullied the declining age of Constantine, will suggest to our most candid thoughts, the idea of a prince, who could sacrifice without reluctance the laws of justice, and the feelings of nature, to the dictates either of his passions or of his interest.

His family. The same fortune which so invariably followed the standard of Constantine, seemed to secure the hopes and comforts of his domestic life. Those among his predecessors who had enjoyed the longest and most prosperous reigns, Augustus,

^a Julius, in the Capitol, arranged as follows his mode. His son, placing Maximian in a confined colosseum, by the Armed Squabellus, with the decalogus of moderate law Commithare, p. 134. 209, 207, 450. Emilian (Oration c. 12) alleges, that Constantine desired for the public, not for himself. Were this admitted, the emilian exemplum could never want an exemplum.

Trajan, and Diocletian, had been disappointed of posterity; and the frequent revolutions had never allowed sufficient time for any imperial family to grow up and multiply under the shade of the purple. But the royalty of the Flavian line, which had been first enabled by the Gothic Claudius, descended through several generations; and Constantine himself derived from his royal father the hereditary honours which he transmitted to his children. The emperor had been twice married. Minervina, the obscure but lawful object of his youthful attachment, had left him only one son, who was called Crispus. By Fausta, the daughter of Maximian, he had three daughters, and three sons, known by the kindred names of Constantine, Constantius, and Constans. The unambitious brothers of the great Constantine, Julius Constantinus, Dalmatius, and Hannibalianus,¹ were permitted to enjoy the most honourable rank, and the most affluent fortune, that could be consistent with a private station. The youngest of the three lived without a name, and died without posterity. His two elder brothers obtained in marriage the daughters of wealthy senators, and propagated new branches of the imperial race. Gallus and

¹ Zosimus and Zonaras agree in representing Minervina as the mistress of Constantine; but Dionysius has very gallantly extolled his character, by ascribing a divorce passage from one of the palatine poets: Ab ipso plus possit et auctoritate legibus abesse.

² Itinéraire (Famille Byzantine, p. 41) mentions all him, after Zosimus, the issue of Constantine: a name somewhat unlikely, as it was already occupied by the elder brother. That of Hannibalianus is mentioned in the Fasti Chronici, and is approved by Theophrastus, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iv, p. 577.

CHAPT. JULIUS afterwards became the most illustrious of XVIII. the children of Julius Constantius, the patrician.
 The two sons of Dalmatius, who had been decorated with the vain title of Cæsar, were named Dalmatius and Hannibalianus. The two sisters of the great Constantine, Anastasia and Eutropia, were bestowed on Optatus and Nepotianus, two senators of noble birth and of consular dignity. His third sister, Constantia, was distinguished by her pre-eminence of greatness and of misery. She remained the widow of the vanquished Licinius; and it was by her entreaties, that an innocent boy, the offspring of their marriage, preserved for some time his life, the title of Cæsar, and a precarious hope of the succession. Besides the females, and the allies of the Flavian house, ten or twelve males, to whom the language of modern courts would apply the title of princes of the blood, seemed, according to the order of their birth, to be destined either to inherit or to support the throne of Constantine. But in less than thirty years, this numerous and increasing family was reduced to the persons of Constantius and Julian, who alone had survived a series of crimes and calamities, such as the tragic poets have deplored in the devoted lines of Pelops and of Cadmus.

Virtues of Crispus.

Crispus, the eldest son of Constantine, and the presumptive heir of the empire, is represented by impartial historians as an amiable and accomplished youth. The care of his education, or at least of his studies, was entrusted to Lactantius, the most eloquent of the christians; a preceptor admirably qualified to form the taste, and to CHAR.

 excite the virtues, of his illustrious disciple? At XVIII.
 the age of seventeen, Crispus was invested with the title of Cæsar, and the administration of the Gallic provinces, where the friends of the Germans gave him an early occasion of signalizing his military prowess. In the civil war which broke out soon afterwards, the father and son divided their powers; and this history has already celebrated the valour as well as conduct displayed by the latter, in forcing the streights of the Hellespont, so obstinately defended by the superior fleet of Licinia. This naval victory contributed to determine the event of the war; and the names of Constantine and of Crispus were united in the joyful acclamations of their eastern subjects, who loudly proclaimed, that the world had been subdued, and was now governed, by an emperor endowed with every virtue: and by his illustrious son, a prince beloved of heaven, and the lively image of his father's perfections. The public favour, which seldom accompanies old age, dis-tined its lustre over the youth of Crispus. He deserved the esteem, and he engaged the affections, of the court, the army, and the people.
 The experienced merit of a reigning monarch is acknowledged by his subjects with reluctance, and frequently denied with partial and discom-

¹ James in Oros. The poverty of Lactantius may be supplied either to the praise of his distinguished philosopher, or to the shame of the reigning pattern. See Tillamont, Mém. de l'Académie, tom. vi, part 1, p. 342. Suppl. Bibliothèque de l'Académie, tom. 1, p. 236. Edinb. London's Credibility of the Usual History, part 2, vol. vi, p. 466.

CHAP. tented murmurs; while, from the opening vir-XVII. tues of his successor, they fondly conceive the most unbounded hopes of private as well as public felicity.*

*Following of Constantine.
 A. D. 311.
 Oct. 10.*

This dangerous popularity soon excited the attention of Constantine, who, both as a father and as a king, was impatient of an equal. Instead of attempting to secure the allegiance of his son, by the generous ties of confidence and gratitude, he resolved to prevent the mischiefs which might be apprehended from dissatisfied ambition. Crispus soon had reason to complain, that while his infant brother Constantius was sent, with the title of Cæsar, to reign over his peculiar department of the Gallic provinces,[†] he, a prince of mature years, who had performed such recent and signal services, instead of being raised to the superior rank of Augustus, was confined almost a prisoner to his father's court; and exposed, without power or defence, to every calumny which the malice of his enemies could suggest. Under such painful circumstances, the royal youth might not always be able to compose his behaviour, or suppress his discontent; and we may be assured, that he was

* French Hist. Ecclesiast. t. 2, c. 9. Eutropius (l. 8, c. 25) also "agonizans viuentem" and Julian (Hist. l. 1) very plainly alludes to the exploits of Crispus in the civil wars. See Spanheim, Commentar.
 p. 92.

† Compare History and the Present, Constantine, with Ammianus
 (l. 20, c. 2). The year in which Constantine was created Cæsar, seems to be more accurately fixed by the ecclesiastical writers; but the historian who lived in his court, could not be ignorant of the day of the anniversary. For the appointment of the new Cæsar to the province of Gaul, see Julian, Hist. l. 4, p. 12. Godefroy, Commentar.
 l. 20, p. 70, and Bunsen de la Trinité de l'Église, p. 1182.

encompassed by a train of indiscreet or perfidious followers, who assiduously studied to inflame, and who were perhaps instructed to betray, the unguarded warmth of his resentment. An edict of Constantine, published about this time, manifestly indicates his real or affected suspicions, that a secret conspiracy had been formed against his person and government. By all the allurements of honours and rewards, he invites informers of every degree to accuse without exception his magistrates or ministers, his friend or his most intimate favourites; protesting, with a solemn asseveration, that he himself will listen to the charges, that he himself will revenge his injuries; and concluding with a prayer, which discovers some apprehension of danger, that the providence of the Supreme Being may still continue to protect the safety of the emperor and of the empire.

CHAP.
XXVI.

A. D. 315.
Constant. 1.

The informers, who complied with so liberal an invitation, were sufficiently versed in the arts of courts to select the friends and adherents of Crispus as the guilty persons; nor is there any reason to distrust the veracity of the emperor, who had promised an ample measure of revenge and punishment. The policy of Constantine maintained, however, the same appearances of regard and confidence towards a son, whom he began to consider as his most irreconcilable enemy. Medals were struck with the customary vows for the long and auspicious reign of the young Caesar.

Disgrace
and death
of Crispus
A. D. 316.
July.

* Hist. Trois. l. vii. p. 17. Godefroy suspected the secret instigation of this law. Comment. tom. iii. p. 16.

† Dionys. Fam. Byzant. p. 78. Tillemont, tom. iv. p. 518.

CHAP.
XVIII.

and as the people, who were not admitted into the secrets of the palace, still loved his virtues, and respected his dignity, a poet who solicits his recall from exile, adores with equal devotion the majesty of the father and that of the son.* The time was now arrived for celebrating the august ceremony of the twentieth year of the reign of Constantine; and the emperor, for that purpose, removed his court from Nicomedia to Rome, where the most splendid preparations had been made for his reception. Every eye, and every tongue, affected to express their sense of the general happiness, and the veil of ceremony and dissimulation was drawn for a while over the darkest designs of revenge and murder.† In the midst of the festival, the unfortunate Crispus was apprehended by order of the emperor, who laid aside the tenderness of a father, without assuming the equity of a judge. The examination was short and private;‡ and as it was thought decent to conceal the fate of the young prince from the eyes of the Roman people, he was sent under a strong guard to Pola, in Istria, where, soon afterwards, he was put to death, either by the hand of the executioner, or by the more gentle operation of poison.⁴ The Cæsar Licinius, a youth of amiable manners, was involved in the ruin of Crispus;⁵ and the stern jealousy of Constantine was unmoved by the prayers and tears of his favourite sister, pleading for the life of a son; whose rank was his only crime, and whose loss she did not long survive. The story of these unhappy princes, the nature and evidence of their guilt, the forms of their trial, and the circumstances of their death, were buried in mysterious obscurity; and the courtly bishop, who has celebrated in an elaborate work the virtues and piety of his hero, observes a prudent silence on the subject of these tragic events.⁶ Such haughty contempt for the opinion of mankind, whilst it imprints an indelible stain on the memory of Constantine, must remind us of the very different behaviour of one of

* His name was Porphyrius Optimus. The date of his passage, various, according to the state of the age, in this passage, is settled by Scaliger ad Euseb. p. 230. Tillemont, tom. iv. p. 407, and Fabricius Bibliot. Latin. t. iv. c. 1.

† Euseb. l. ii. p. 103. Godfrey Chronol. Legum, p. 88.

‡ Express, without a trial, is the strong, and most positive the fact, expression of Suidas. The elder Vatro, who wrote under the said reign, speaks with burning earnestness: "Such greater honour and good, people justice condemn!" If we consult the preceding writers, Eusebius, the younger Vatro, Orosius, Sozomen, Zosimus, Philostorgius, and Gregory of Tours; their accounts will appear generally in unison, at their scenes of infamy and blood: here mentioned; a circumstance which frequently occurs in historical dissimulation.

⁴ Ammianus (l. xiv. c. 11) uses the general expression of poisoning. Cælius (p. 24) assigns the young prince's fall to some Apollinaris (Epiphani. v. 76, for the sake perhaps of an allusion to Faust's woe), though he attributes a draught of cold poison.

⁵ Societas illam, christianis locis forem. Eusebius, v. c. May I not be permitted to conjecture, that Crispus had married Eudocia, the daughter of the emperor Licinius, and died on the happy delivery of the peltastes, in the year 313, a general pardon was granted by Constantine (see Theodoret, Fast. Byzant. p. 47, and the text of 14, 11, nearly of the Theodosian Code, which has so much embarrassed the interpreters. Godefroy, note 36, p. 227.

⁶ See the life of Constantine, particularly l. ii. c. 19-30. Two hundred and fifty years afterwards, Eusebius (l. vi. c. 43) deduced from the silence of Eusebius a vitæ argumentum against the reality of the fact.

CHAP. the greatest monarchs of the present age. The 25111. Czar Peter, in the full possession of despotic power, submitted to the judgment of Russia, of Europe, and of posterity, the reasons which had compelled him to subscribe the condemnation of a criminal, or at least of a degenerate, son.*

The emperor
 Constantine.

The innocence of Crispus was so universally acknowledged, that the modern Greeks, who adore the memory of their founder, are reduced to palliate the guilt of a parricide, which the common feelings of human nature forbade them to justify. They pretend, that as soon as the afflicted father discovered the falsehood of the accusation by which his credulity had been so fatally misled, he published to the world his repentance and remorse; that he mourned forty days, during which he abstained from the use of the bath, and all the ordinary comforts of life; and that, for the lasting instruction of posterity, he erected a golden statue of Crispus, with this memorable inscription: To my son, whom I unjustly condemned. A tale so moral and so interesting would deserve to be supported by less exceptionable authority; but if we consult the more ancient and authentic writers, they will inform us, that the repentance of Constantine was manifested only in acts of blood and revenge; and that he atoned for the murder of an innocent son, by the execution,

* Memoria de Pierre le Grand, par Voltaire, part II. c. 2.

† It is often supposed, that the statue was erected by Constantine, and placed with reverence by the orders of the Arabs. Goltius very readily credits (p. 28) two versions, Hypothese, and the younger Pliny, as when imaginary histories he speaks with unthinking credence.

perhaps of a guilty wife. They ascribe the misfortunes of Crispus to the arts of his step-mother Fausta, whose implacable hatred, or whose disappointed love, renewed in the palace of Constantine the ancient tragedy of Hippolytus and of Phœdra.* Like the daughter of Minos, the daughter of Maximian accused her son-in-law of an incestuous attempt on the chastity of his father's wife; and easily obtained, from the jealousy of the emperor, a sentence of death against a young prince, whom she considered with reason as the most formidable rival of her own children. But Helena, the aged mother of Constantine, lamented and revenged the untimely fate of her grandson Crispus: nor was it long before a real or pretended discovery was made, that Fausta herself entertained a criminal connection with a slave belonging to the imperial stables.† Her condemnation and punishment were the instant consequences of the charge; and the adulteress was suffocated by the steam of a bath, which for that purpose had been heated to an extraordinary degree.‡ By some it will perhaps be

* Ætius (l. vi. p. 103) may be considered as our original. The imposture of the moderns, noticed by a few lines from the sources, has distorted and impaired the clear and impartial narrative.

† Philostorgius, l. ii. c. 4. Ætius (l. vi. p. 104, 105) implies in Constantine the death of two wives, of the deceased Fausta, and of an adulteress who was the mother of his three sons. According to Jordan, three or four years elapsed between the death of Fausta and that of Fausta. The date Verus is probably right.

‡ Ætius (l. vi. p. 104) it is necessary to believe that the prison apartments of the prince were the scene of her execution.

The

CHAP.
XXVII

thought, that the remembrance of a conjugal union of twenty years, and the honour of their common offspring, the destined heirs of the throne, might have softened the obdurate heart of Constantine; and persuaded him to suffer his wife, however guilty she might appear, to expiate her offences in a solitary prison. But it seems a superfluous labour to weigh the propriety, unless we could ascertain the truth, of this singular event; which is attended with some circumstances of doubt and perplexity. Those who have attacked, and those who have defended, the character of Constantine, have alike disregarded two very remarkable passages of two orations pronounced under the succeeding reign. The former celebrates the virtues, the beauty, and the fortune of the empress Fausta, the daughter, wife, sister, and mother of so many princes.* The latter asserts, in explicit terms, that the mother of the younger Constantine, who was slain three years after his father's death, survived to weep over the fate of her son.* Notwithstanding the positive testimony of several writers of the pagan

The master Chrysostom acknowledges his folly by expressing the naked emotion of a doubt question, to be dissolved by wild humor.

* Julius, chet. 1. He seems to call her the mother of Celyph. She might assume that title by adoption. At least, she was not considered as his sexual enemy. Julius compares the friends of Fausta with that of Parysatis, the Persian queen. A Roman would have more naturally resented the second Agrippine!

The model used here for the system of equations is May 4th. Sunday. Snow and rain all day.

* Mount, in Constantin. Jan. 1, 4, ad Calves Emery, edit.
Niversburg. The statue style has the same diving and point of view.

as well as of the christian religion, there may still remain some reason to believe, or at least to suspect, that Fausta escaped the blind and suspicious cruelty of her husband. The deaths of a son, and of a nephew, with the execution of a great number of respectable, and perhaps innocent friends,* who were involved in their fall, may be sufficient, however, to justify the discontent of the Roman people, and to explain the satirical verses affixed to the palace-gate, comparing the splendid and bloody reign of Constantine and Nero.⁵

By the death of Crispus, the inheritance of the empire seemed to devolve on the three sons of Fausta, who have been already mentioned under the names of Constantine, of Constantius, and of Constans. These young princes were successively invested with the title of Cæsar; and the dates of their promotion may be referred to the tenth, the twentieth, and the thirtieth years of the reign of their father.⁶ This conduct, though it tended to multiply the future masters of the Roman world, might be excused by the partiality of paternal affection; but it is not easy to understand

* Interfecti summorum virorum. Euseb. vi. 8.

§ Natural causes would give reason for their free games, and Nervianum.

Idem. A constant. c. 8.

It is somewhat singular, that these several sons should be considered, not as an arctus cluster, or a disappointed party, but as adherents, prime-minister and domestic, of the emperor. We only now perceive that the imperiousness of the Roman people was dictated by luxury, as well as by superstition. Idem. l. 3. p. 154.

¶ Euseb. Orig. in Constantian. c. 2. These facts are collectively current to justify the verses.

CHAP.
XVII.

the motives of the emperor, when he endangered the safety both of his family and of his people, by the unnecessary elevation of his two nephews, Dalmatius and Hanniballianus. The former was raised, by the title of Cæsar, to an equality with his cousins. In favour of the latter, Constantine invented the new and singular appellation of Nobilissimus;¹ to which he annexed the flattering distinction of a robe of purple and gold. But of the whole series of Roman princes in any age of the empire, Hanniballianus alone was distinguished by the title of King; a name which the subjects of Tiberius would have detested, as the profane and cruel insult of capricious tyranny. The use of such a title, even as it appears under the reign of Constantine, is a strange and unconnected fact, which can scarcely be admitted on the joint authority of imperial medals and contemporary writers.²

Thirlwall
ch. 104

The whole empire was deeply interested in the education of these five youths, the acknowledged successors of Constantine. The exercises of the body prepared them for the fatigues of war, and the duties of active life. Those who occasionally mention the education or talents of Constantius, allow that he excelled in the gymnastic arts of leaping and running; that he was a dexterous archer, a skilful horseman, and a master of all the different weapons used in the service either of the cavalry or of the infantry.* The same assiduous cultivation was bestowed, though not perhaps with equal success, to improve the minds of the sons and nephews of Constantine. The most celebrated professors of the christian faith, of the Grecian philosophy, and of the Roman jurisprudence, were invited by the liberality of the emperor, who reserved for himself the important task of instructing the royal youths in the science of government, and the knowledge of mankind. But the genius of Constantine himself had been formed by adversity and experience. In the free intercourse of private life, and amidst the dangers of the court of Galerius, he had learned to command his own passions, to encounter those of his equals, and to depend for his present safety and future greatness on the prudence and firmness of his personal conduct. His destined successors had the misfortune of being born and educated in the imperial purple. Incessantly surrounded with a train of flatterers, they passed their youth in the enjoyment of luxury and the expectation of a throne; nor would the dignity of their rank per-

¹ Thron. l. ii. p. 117. Under the government of Constantine, Nobilissimus was a vague appellation, rather than a legal and determined title.

² Admonest. honor. veteris m. regulæ. Apollon. de Theophrast. Diocet. l. ii. c. 66. m. p. 117. Anonymous speaks of this Roman king (l. vi. c. 1) and Valentin (l. vi.). The Vatican Fragment calls him king of kings, and the Pseudo-Chronicle (p. 189), by employing the word Papa, argues the weight of Latin evidence.

* His dexterity in martial exercises is celebrated by Julian (Orat. 1. p. 11), and allowed by Ammianus (l. 22. c. 16).

* Lactantius, in Vit. Constantini, l. 4. c. 21; Julian. Orat. 1. p. 12-14, with Spalding's glowing commentary. Liberius, Orat. 10. p. 100. Constantine studied with insatiable eagerness; but the duties of his office prevented him from succeeding in the art of poetry, or quest of eloquence.

CHAP.
XVIII.

mit them to descend from that elevated station from whence the various characters of human nature appear to wear a smooth and uniform aspect. The indulgence of Constantine admitted them, at a very tender age, to share the administration of the empire; and they studied the art of reigning at the expense of the people entrusted to their care. The younger Constantine was appointed to hold his court in Gaul; and his brother Constantius exchanged that department, the ancient patrimony of their father, for the more opulent, but less martial, countries of the East. Italy, the Western Illyricum, and Africa, were accustomed to revere Constantine, the third of his sons, as the representative of the great Constantine. He fixed Dalmatians on the Gothic frontier, to which he annexed the government of Thracia, Macedonia, and Greece. The city of Caesarea was chosen for the residence of Hannibalianus; and the provinces of Pontus, Cappadocia, and the Lesser Armenia, were destined to form the extent of his new kingdom. For each of these princes a suitable establishment was provided. A just proportion of guards, of legions, and of auxiliaries, was allotted for their respective dignity and defence. The ministers and generals, who were placed about their persons, were such as Constantine could trust to assist, and even to controul; these youthful sovereigns in the exercise of their delegated power. As they advanced in years and experience, the limits of their authority were insensibly enlarged: but the emperor always reserved for himself the title of Augustus:

and while he shewed the Cæsars to the armies and provinces, he maintained every part of the empire in equal obedience to its supreme head.* The tranquillity of the last fourteen years of his reign was scarcely interrupted by the contemptible insurrection of a camel-driver in the island of Cyprus,† or by the active part which the policy of Constantine engaged him to assume in the wars of the Goths and Sarmatians.

Among the different branches of the human race, the Sarmatians form a very remarkable shade; as they seem to unite the manners of the Asiatic barbarians with the figure and complexion of the ancient inhabitants of Europe. According to the various accidents of peace and war, of alliance or conquest, the Sarmatians were sometimes confined to the banks of the Tanais; and they sometimes spread themselves over the immense plains which lie between the Vistula and the Volga.‡ The care of their numerous flocks and herds, the pursuit of game, and the exercise of war, or rather of rapine, directed the vagrant of the Sarmatians.

Manners

* Eusebius G. iv. c. 41-45, with a design of exalting the authority and glory of Constantine, asserts, that he divided the Roman empire as a philosopher might have divided his patrimony. His distribution of the provinces may be collected from Eusebius, the two Victorians, and the Valesian fragments.

† Calpurnius, the obscure leader of this rebellion, or rather tumult, was apprehended and never alive in the market-place of Treves, by the vigilance of Delmatius. See the other Victor, the Chronicle of Isaac, and the dissipated traditions of Theophanes and Callistus.

‡ Callistus has collected the opinions of the ancient geographers (the Europeans and Asiatic Sarmatians) and M. d'Anville has applied them to modern geography with the skill and accuracy which always distinguish that excellent writer.

CHAP.
XVIII.

movements of the Sarmatians. The moveable camps or cities, the ordinary residence of their wives and children, consisted only of large waggon drawn by oxen, and covered in the form of tents. The military strength of the nation was composed of cavalry; and the custom of their warriors, to lead in their hand one or two spare horses, enabled them to advance and to retreat with rapid diligence, which surprised the security, and eluded the pursuit, of a distant enemy.* Their poverty of iron prompted their rude industry to invent a sort of cuirass, which was capable of resisting a sword or javelin, though it was formed only of horses' hoofs, cut into thin and polished slices, carefully laid over each other in the manner of scales or feathers, and strongly sewed upon an under-garment of coarse linen.† The offensive arms of the Sarmatians were short daggers, long lances, and a weighty bow with a quiver of arrows. They were reduced to the necessity of employing fish bones for the points of their weapons; but the custom of dipping them in a venomous liquor, that poisoned the wounds which they inflicted, is alone sufficient to prove the most savage manners; since a people impressed with a sense of humanity would have abhorred so cruel a practice, and a nation skilled in the arts of war would have disdained so impotent a re-

* Herodotus, l. iv. c. 68. The Sarmatians' horses were accustomed to prevent the continuous collisions, which might happen from the being and incessantly pressing of the nation.

† Pausanias, l. i. p. 38. edit. Kuhn. This description transmitted scarcely exhibited a Sarmatian cuirass, which was preserved in the temple of Amulius at Athens.

source.* Whenever these barbarians issued from their deserts in quest of prey, their shaggy beards, uncombed locks, the furs with which they were covered from head to foot, and their fierce countenances, which seemed to express the innate cruelty of their minds, inspired the more civilized provincials of Rome with horror and dismay.

The tender Ovid, after a youth spent in the enjoyment of fame and luxury, was condemned to an hopeless exile on the frozen banks of the Danube, where he was exposed, almost without defence, to the fury of those monsters of the desert, with whose stern spirits he feared that his gentle shade might hereafter be confounded. In his pathetic, but sometimes unmanly lamentations,† he describes, in the most lively colours, the dress and manners, the arms and incursions of the Getæ

CHAP.
XVIII.
They settlement near the Danube.

* Auguste et moi, qui sommes nés à Rome,
Et vivons dans un monde si différent.

Ode au Prince, l. 3, p. 1, v. 1.

See in the Richardson and the Annotated, vol. II, p. 254-255, a very curious observation on painted skins. The word was commonly estimated from the vegetable origin; but that suggested by the Egyptians appears to have been derived from the viper, and is native of human flesh. The use of painted arms, which has been spread over this world, never possessed a more noble than the name of a disguised enemy.

† The same Ovid, of Political Epistles, which Ovid composed during the seven last years of his voluntary exile, presents himself the spirit of eloquence, a double value. They contain a picture of the human mind under very different circumstances; and they contain many curious observations, which no Roman, except Ovid, could have had opportunity of making. Every circumstance which tends to illustrate the history of the barbarians, has been deeply marked by the very accurate Ovid de Pont. What Anthonius de Perce, de l'Académie, tom. IV, v. 2, p. 205-217.

CHAP.
XVIII.

and Sarmatians, who were associated for the purposes of destruction; and from the accounts of history, there is some reason to believe that these Sarmatians were the Jazygæ, one of the most numerous and warlike tribes of the nation. The allurements of plenty engaged them to seek a permanent establishment on the frontiers of the empire. Soon after the reign of Augustus, they obliged the Dacians, who subsisted by fishing on the banks of the river Teyss or Tibiscus, to retire into the hilly country, and to abandon to the victorious Sarmatians the fertile plains of the Upper Hungary, which are bounded by the course of the Danube and the semi-circular inclosure of the Carpathian mountains.* In this advantageous position, they watched or suspended the moment of attack, as they were provoked by injuries or appeased by presents; they gradually acquired the skill of using more dangerous weapons; and although the Sarmatians did not illustrate their name by any memorable exploits, they occasionally assisted their eastern and western neighbours, the Goths and the Germans, with a formidable body of cavalry. They lived under the irregular aristocracy of their chieftains;† but after they had received into their bosom the fugitive Van-

* The Sarmatians Jazygæ were settled on the banks of the Tibiscus or Tibiscus, whom Ptolemy, in the year 132, placed in his Geographical History. See Livy, l. 41. In the time of Hadrian and Ovid, many of serious persecutions, they appear to have inhabited beyond the Danube, along the coast of the Eufrates.

† The Sarmatians Jazygæ were given to the Goths and the Germans, who were the most powerful and well-armed nations of the time. Their chief was called in the civil war between Vandal and Visigoth.

dals, who yielded to the pressure of the Gothic power, they seem to have chosen a king from that nation, and from the illustrious race of the Astingi, who had formerly dwelt on the shores of the northern ocean?

This motive of enmity must have inflamed the subjects of contention, which perpetually arise on the confines of warlike and independent nations. The Vandal princes were stimulated by fear and revenge; the Gothic kings aspired to extend their dominion from the Euxine to the frontiers of Germany; and the waters of the Maros, a small river which falls into the Teyss, were stained with the blood of the contending barbarians. After some experience of the superior strength and number of their adversaries, the Sarmatians implored the protection of the Roman monarch, who beheld with pleasure the discord of the nations, but who was justly alarmed by the progress of the Gothic arms. As soon as Constantine had declared himself in favour of the weaker party, the haughty Araric, king of the Goths, instead of expecting the attack of the legions, boldly passed the Danube, and spread terror and devastation through the province of Mœsia. To oppose the inroad of this destroying host, the aged emperor took the field in person; but on this occasion either his conduct or his fortune betrayed the glory which he had acquired in so many fo-

* This hypothesis of a Vandal king reigning over Sarmatian subjects, seems necessary to reconcile the Goth Jormundus with the Greek and Latin historians of Constantine. It may be observed that Isidore, who lived in Spain under the dominion of the Goths, gives them the surname, not the Vandals, but the Sarmatians. See his Chronicle in Gerdes, p. 798.

QUAR
XXIII.

rough and domestic wars. He had the mortification of seeing his troops fly before an inconsiderable detachment of the barbarians, who pursued them to the edge of their fortified camp, and obliged him to consult his safety by a precipitate and ignominious retreat. The event of a second and more successful action retrieved the honour of the Roman name; and the powers of art and discipline prevailed, after an obstinate contest, over the efforts of irregular valour. The broken army of the Goths abandoned the field of battle, the wasted province, and the passage of the Danube; and although the eldest of the sons of Constantine was permitted to supply the place of his father, the merit of the victory, which diffused universal joy, was ascribed to the auspicious counsels of the emperor himself.

A.D. 323,
April 10.

He contributed at least to improve this advantage, by his negotiations with the free and warlike people of Chersonesus,* whose capital, situate on the western coast of the Tauric or Crimæan peninsula, still retained some vestiges of a Grecian colony, and was governed by a perpetual magistrate, assisted by a council of senators, emphatically styled the Fathers of the City. The Cher-

* I may stand in need of some apology for having used, without scruple, the authority of Constantine Porphyrogenitus, to all that relates to the wars and negotiations of the Chersonites. I am aware that he was a Greek of the sixth century, and that his accounts of ancient history are frequently confused and mistaken. But on this subject his narrative is, for the most part, consistent and probable; and it seems much safer to conjecture that an impostor might have written some small additions, which had misled the diligence of modern historians. For the situation and history of Cherson, see Reyonsset des Peuples barbares qui ont habité les bords du Danube, &c. vol. p. 84-99.

scythians were animated against the Goths, by the memory of the wars, which, in the preceding century, they had maintained with unequal forces against the invaders of their country. They were connected with the Romans, by the mutual benefits of commerce: as they were supplied from the provinces of Asia with corn and manufactures, which they purchased with their only productions, salt, wax, and hides. Obedient to the requisition of Constantine, they prepared, under the conduct of their magistrate Diogenes, a considerable army, of which the principal strength consisted in cross-bows and military chariots. The speedy march and intrepid attack of the Chersonites, by diverting the attention of the Goths, assisted the operations of the imperial generals. The Goths, vanquished on every side, were driven into the mountains, where, in the course of a severe campaign, above an hundred thousand were compelled to have perished by cold and hunger. Peace was at length granted to their humble applications; the eldest son of Araric was accepted as the most valuable hostage; and Constantine endeavoured to convince their chiefs, by a liberal distribution of honours and rewards, how far the friendship of the Romans was preferable to their vanity. In the expressions of his gratitude towards the faithful Chersonites, the emperor was still more magnificent. The pride of the nation was gratified by the splendid and almost royal decorations bestowed on their magistrate and his successors. A perpetual exemption from all duties was stipulated for their vessels which traded to the ports of the

CHAP.
XVIII.

Black sea. A regular subsidy was promised, of iron, corn, oil, and of every supply which could be useful either in peace or war. But it was thought that the Sarmatians were sufficiently rewarded by their deliverance from impending ruin; and the emperor, perhaps with too strict an economy, deducted some part of the expences of the war from the customary gratifications which were allowed to that turbulent nation.

Expedition of the Sarmatians,
A.D. 314.

Exasperated by this apparent neglect, the Sarmatians soon forgot, with the levity of barbarians, the services which they had so lately received, and the dangers which still threatened their safety. Their incursions on the territory of the empire provoked the indignation of Constantine to leave them to their fate, and he no longer opposed the ambition of Geberis, a renowned warrior, who had recently ascended the Gothic throne. Wimer, the Vandal king, whilst alone, and unassisted, he defended his dominions with undaunted courage, was vanquished and slain in a decisive battle, which swept away the flower of the Sarmatian youth. The remainder of the nation embraced the desperate expedient of arming their slaves, a hardy race of hunters and herdsmen, by whose tumultuary aid, they revenged their defeat, and expelled the invader from their confines. But they soon discovered that they had exchanged a foreign for a domestic enemy, more dangerous and more implacable. Enraged by their former servitude, elated by their present glory, the slaves, under the name of Limigantes, claimed and usurped the possession of the country which they had saved. Their masters, unable to withstand

The ungoverned fury of the populace, preferred the hardships of exile to the tyranny of their servants. Some of the fugitive Sarmatians solicited a less ignominious dependence, under the hostile standard of the Goths. A more numerous band retired beyond the Carpathian mountains, among the Quadi, their German allies, and were easily admitted to share a superfluous waste of uncultivated land. But the far greater part of the distressed nation turned their eyes towards the fruitful provinces of Rome. Imploring the protection and forgiveness of the emperor, they solemnly promised, as subjects in peace, and as soldiers in war, the most inviolable fidelity to the empire which should graciously receive them into its bosom. According to the maxims adopted by Probus and his successors, the offers of this barbarian colony were eagerly accepted; and a competent portion of lands in the provinces of Pannonia, Thrace, Macedonia, and Italy, were immediately assigned for the habitation and subsistence of three hundred thousand Sarmatians.*

By chastising the pride of the Goths, and by accepting the homage of a suppliant nation, Co-

5 The Gothic and Slavonian want not to be taken in to believe and suppose a manner, that I have been obliged to compare the following writers, who mutually reject, suspect, and distrust each other. Those who will take the same trouble, may suppose a slight alluding my narrative. Annals, i. 174, n. 12. Strabo, Vellius, p. 174. Strabo, n. 1. Servius Belles de Pyrenæa, c. 26. Julius, Ant. l. p. 6, and Spandius Comment. p. 94. Hieronym. in Chron. Koch in Vit. Constantin. l. 7, n. 4. Sextus, l. 1, c. 28. Strabo, l. 1, c. 8. Zosimus, l. 3, p. 108. Jerome de Re Galien. n. 27. Idem in Chron. p. 109; in Not. Constantin. Comment. Porphyrogenet. de Administrat. Imperii. c. 33, p. 239, ed. Munich.

CHAP.
XVIII.

A. D. 337.
May 22.

Constantine asserted the majesty of the Roman empire; and the ambassadors of Ethiopia, Persia, and the most remote countries of India, congratulated the peace and prosperity of his government.¹ If he reckoned, among the favours of fortune, the death of his eldest son, of his nephew, and perhaps of his wife, he enjoyed an uninterrupted flow of private as well as public felicity, till the thirtieth year of his reign: a period which none of his predecessors, since Augustus, had been permitted to celebrate. Constantine survived that solemn festival about ten months; and, at the mature age of sixty-four, after a short illness, he ended his memorable life at the palace of Aquyrium, in the suburbs of Nicomedia, whither he had retired for the benefit of the air, and with the hope of recovering his exhausted strength by the use of the warm baths. The extensive demonstrations of grief, or at least of mourning, surpassed whatever had been practised on any former occasion. Notwithstanding the claims of the senate and people of ancient Rome, the corpse of the deceased emperor, according to his last request, was transported to the city, which was destined to preserve the name and memory of its founder. The body of Constantine, adorned with the vain symbols of greatness, the purple and diadem, was deposited on a golden bed in one of the apartments of the palace, which for that purpose had been splendidly furnished and illuminated. The forms of the court were strictly maintained. Every day, at the appointed hours, the principal officers of the state, the army, and the household, approaching the person of their sovereign with bended knees and a composed countenance, offered their respectful homage as seriously as if he had been still alive. From motives of policy, this theatrical representation was for some time continued; nor could flattery neglect the opportunity of remarking that Constantine alone, by the peculiar indulgence of heaven, had reigned after his death.*

¹ Eusebius, lib. Vii. Cap. 3. & 4. He mentions three circumstances relative to these Indians. 1. They came from the shores of the eastern ocean; a description which might be applied to the coast of China or Japan. 2. They presented striking gold and silver ornaments. 3. They presented three flags had erected on poles to represent the empire beyond of Constantine.

But this reign could subsist only in empty pageantry; and it was soon discovered that the will of the most absolute monarch is seldom obeyed, when his subjects have no longer any thing to hope from his favour, or to dread from his resentment. The same ministers and generals who bowed with such reverential awe before the inanimate corpse of their deceased sovereign, were engaged in secret consultations to exclude his two nephews, Dalmatius and Hannibalianus, from the share which he had assigned them in the succession of the empire. We are too imperfectly acquainted with the court of Constantine to form any judgment of the real motives which influenced the leaders of the conspiracy; unless we should suppose that they were actuated by a spirit of jealousy and revenge against the præfect Ablavius, a proud favourite, who had long directed the counsels and abused the confidence of the late emperor. The arguments by which they solicited the concurrence of the soldiers and people, are of a more obvious nature; and they might with decency, as well as truth, insist on the superior rank of the children of Constantine, the danger of multiplying the number of sovereigns, and the impending mischiefs which threatened the republic, from the discord of so many rival princes, who were not connected by the tender sympathy of fraternal affection. The intrigue was conducted with zeal and secrecy, till a loud and unanimous declaration was procured from the troops, that they would suffer none except the sons of their lamented monarch to reign over the Roman empire.* The younger Dalmatius, who was united with his collateral relations by the ties of friendship and interest, is allowed to have inherited a considerable share of the abilities of the great Constantine; but, on this occasion, he does not appear to have concerted any measures for supporting, by arms, the just claims which himself and his royal brother derived from the liberality of their uncle. Astonished and overwhelmed by the tide of po-polar fury, they seem to have remained, without the power of flight or of resistance, in the hands of their invincible enemies. Their fate was suspended till the arrival of Constantius, the second,* and perhaps the most favoured, of the sons of Constantine.

* Præterea solatium in nobis, ut scribitur, quod postea a. septimo milio. Amelius Victor. Constantinus had prepared for himself a stately tomb in the church of the Holy Apostles. Euseb. l. iv. c. 60. The fact, and indeed almost the only account of the manners, death, and funeral of Constantine, is contained in the fourth book of his life, by Eusebius.

* Ætius (l. 16, v. 9) ascribes his success by this legal declaration of the troops, and avoids all the heinous circumstances of the subsequent massacre.

CHAP.
XVIII

The voice of the dying emperor had recommended the care of his funeral to the piety of Constantius; and that prince, by the vicinity of his eastern station, could easily prevent the diligence of his brothers, who resided in their distant government of Italy and Gaul. As soon as he had taken possession of the palace of Constantinople, his first care was to remove the apprehensions of his kinsmen by a solemn oath, which he pledged for their security. His next employment was to find some specious pretence which might release his conscience from the obligation of an imprudent promise. The arts of fraud were made subservient to the designs of cruelty; and a mendacious forgery was attested by a person of the most sacred character. From the hands of the bishop of Nicomedia, Constantius received a fatal scroll, affirmed to be the genuine testament of his father: in which the emperor expressed his suspicions that he had been poisoned by his brothers: and conjured his sons to revenge his death,

History
of the Emperor.

* The character of Delatius is strategically, though seemingly driven by Eusebius (c. 3). Delatius comes praepositus indies, imperis patris dominus, head made post, represent on Delatius (c. 3). As both Jerome and the Alexandrian Chronicle mention the third year of the Crisis, which did not commence till the loss of Fakh al-Supremacy, c. 271, it is certain that these military functions continued about four months.

CHAP.
XVIII.

and to consult their own safety, by the punishment of the guilty.* Whatever reasons might have been alleged by these unfortunate princes to defend their life and honour against so incredible an accusation, they were silenced by the furious clamours of the soldiers, who declared themselves, at once, their enemies, their judges, and their executioners. The spirit, and even the forms of legal proceedings were repeatedly violated in a promiscuous massacre, which involved the two uncles of Constantius, seven of his cousins, of whom Dalmatius and Hannibalianus were the most illustrious, the patrician Optatus, who had married a sister of the late emperor, and the prefect Ablavius, whose power and riches had inspired him with some hopes of obtaining the purple. If it were necessary to aggravate the horrors of this bloody scene, we might add, that Constantius himself had espoused the daughter of his uncle Julius, and that he had bestowed his sister in marriage on his cousin Hannibalianus. These alliances, which the policy of Constantine, regardless of the public prejudice,† had formed

* I have related this singular episode on the authority of Theodoretus, l. ii. c. 18. But if such a picture was ever used by Constantine and his adherents, it was told obtusè with reserve, as well as it had served their immediate purpose. Ammianus (l. vi. c. 10) mentions the oath which Constantius had taken for the safety of his kingdom.

† Grogan's observations Ann. lxxviii. (supra) which presentment. Tacit. Ann. vi. c. 5, and S. p. 100 ad loc. The cry of the instant day, and the power of ten hundred years, were insufficient to eradicate the prejudices of the Romans; who still considered the marriage of kinsmen, as a species of incestuous union (Grogan de Civitate Dei, vi. 302 and Julius, whose will was based between the several branches of the imperial house, served only to convince mankind, that these princes were as cold to the endearments of conjugal affection, as they were insensible to the ties of consanguinity, and the moving entreaties of youth and innocence. Of so numerous a family, Gallus and Julian alone, the two youngest children of Julius Constantius, were saved from the hands of the assassins, till their rage, satiated with slaughter, had in some measure subsided. The emperor Constantius, who, in the absence of his brothers, was the most obnoxious to guilt and reproach, discovered, on some future occasions, a faint and transient remorse for those cruelties which the perfidious counsels of his ministers, and the irresistible violence of the troops, had extorted from his unexperienced youth.*

The massacre of the Flavian race was succeeded by a new division of the provinces; which was

Division of the empire
A. D. 311.
Sept. 11.

by separation and re-union; stipulations drew unusual alliances between his own emperors with the apostolical epistles of popes as in 311 (Orat. vi), p. 478. The independence of the church has since revived and enforced this prohibition, without being able to introduce it either into the civil or the common law of Europe. See on the subject of these marriages, Taylor's Civil Law, p. 231, Revue de Juris Canonique v. s. 12. Revue de Juris Canonique, part iii, n. 1. Warty Geschichte des Orients, tom. i, p. 231. Paris, 1767, and Les Papes Latins des Conciles Toulon, 1768.

* Julius (ad A. N. A. Athos, p. 176) charges his cousin Constantius with the whole guilt of a massacre, from which he himself is narrowly escaped. His assertion is confirmed by Athanasius, who, for reasons of a very different nature, yet not for an excuse of Constantius (tom. i, p. 244). Revue de Juris Canonique, part iii, n. 1. Warty Geschichte des Orients, tom. i, p. 231. Paris, 1767, and Les Papes Latins des Conciles Toulon, 1768. "quod maxime," "et in ultimum."

ORAP.
XVIII.

ratified in a personal interview of the three brothers. Constantine, the eldest of the Caesars, obtained, with a certain pre-eminence of rank, the possession of the new capital, which bore his own name and that of his father. Thrace and the countries of the east, were allotted for the patrimony of Constantius; and Constant was acknowledged as the lawful sovereign of Italy, Africa, and the western Illyricum. The armies submitted to their hereditary right; and they condescended, after some delay, to accept from the Roman senate, the title of Augustus. When they first assumed the reins of government, the eldest of these princes was twenty-one, the second twenty, and the third only seventeen, years of age.¹

Sapor, King of Persia,
A. D. 310.

While the martial nations of Europe followed the standards of his brothers, Constantius, at the head of the effeminate troops of Asia, was left to sustain the weight of the Persian war. At the decease of Constantine, the throne of the East was filled by Sapor, son of Hormouz or Hormisdas, and grandson of Narses, who, after the victory of Galerius, had humbly confessed the superiority of the Roman power. Although Sapor was in the thirtieth year of his long reign, he was still in the vigour of youth, as the date of his accession, by a very strange fatality, had preceded that of his birth. The wife of Hormouz remained pregnant at the time of her husband's death; and the un-

¹ Euseb. in Vit. Constantini, l. iv. c. 38. Zosimus, l. ii. p. 123. Idem. in Chron. See the names of THYMOTUS, HAN, and AUGUSTARIUS, in, p. 1088-1091. The origin of the eldest brother at Constantinople is noticed only in the Alexandrian Chronicle.

certainly of the sex, as well as of the event, excited the ambitious hopes of the princes of the house of Sassan. The apprehensions of civil war were at length removed, by the positive assurance of the magi, that the widow of Hormouz had conceived, and would safely produce a son. Obedient to the voice of superstition, the Persians prepared, without delay, the ceremony of his coronation. A royal bed, on which the queen lay in state, was exhibited in the midst of the palace; the diadem was placed on the spot, which might be supposed to conceal the future heir of Artaxerxes, and the prostrate Satraps adored the majesty of their invisible and insensible sovereign.² If any credit can be given to this marvellous tale, which seems however to be countenanced by the manners of the people, and by the extraordinary duration of his reign, we must admire not only the fortune, but the genius, of Sapor. In the soft sequestered education of a Persian harem, the royal youth could discover the importance of exercising the vigour of his mind and body; and, by his personal merit, deserved a throne, on which he had been seated, while he was yet unconscious of the duties and temptations of absolute power. His minority was exposed to the almost inevitable calamities of domestic discord: his capital was surprised and plundered by Thair, a powerful king of Yemen, or Arabia; and the majesty of the royal family was degraded by the captivity of a princess, the sister of the deceased king. But as soon as Sapor attained the age of manhood, the presumptuous Thair, his nation, and his country, fell beneath the first effort of the young warrior: who used his victory with so judicious a mixture of rigour and clemency, that he obtained, from the fears and gratitude of the Arabs, the title of Dhoulacnaf, or protector of the nation.¹

² Agathang, who lived in the sixth century, is the author of this story (c. ix, p. 123, edit. Lantier). He derived his information from more sources of the Persian Chronicle, compiled and translated by the interpreter Agathang, during his embassy at that court. The coronation of the monarch of Sapor is likewise mentioned by Strabo (l. viii, p. 114), and d'Hartshorn (Asiatique Orientale, p. 103).

CHAP.
XXVII.

State of Mesopotamia and Armenia.

The ambition of the Persians, to whom his enemies ascribe the virtues of a soldier and a statesman, was animated by the desire of revenging the disgrace of his fathers, and of wresting from the hands of the Romans the five provinces beyond the Tigris. The military fame of Constantine, and the real or apparent strength of his government, suspended the attack; and while the hostile conduct of Sapor provoked the resentment, his artful negotiations amused the patience, of the imperial court. The death of Constantine was the signal of war,² and the actual condition of the Syrian and Armenian frontier, seemed to encourage the Persians, by the prospect of a rich spoil, and an easy conquest. The example of the massacres of the palace, diffused a spirit of firm-

¹ D'Herbelot, Bibliothèque Orientale, p. 764.

² — See Notus Notus 66-70, who on this occasion is an contemptible authority, asserts, that the Persians sent in vain for peace, and that Constantine was preparing to march against them: yet the stronger weight of the testimony of Theodoret, obliges us to admit the preliminary, if not the ratification, of the treaty. See Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iv. p. 475.

tionness and sedition among the troops of the East, who were no longer restrained by their habits of obedience to a veteran commander. By the prudence of Constantius, who, from the interview with his brothers in Pannonia, immediately hastened to the banks of the Euphrates, the legions were gradually restored to a sense of duty and discipline; but the season of anarchy had permitted Sapor to form the siege of Nisibis, and to occupy several of the most important fortresses of Mesopotamia.* In Armenia, the renowned Tiridates had long enjoyed the peace and glory which he deserved by his valour and fidelity to the cause of Rome. The firm alliance which he maintained with Constantius, was productive of spiritual as well as of temporal benefits; by the conversion of Tiridates, the character of a saint was applied to that of a hero, the christian faith was preached and established from the Euphrates to the shores of the Caspian, and Armenia was attached to the empire by the double ties of policy and of religion. But as many of the Armenian nobles still refused to abandon the plurality of their gods and of their wives, the public tranquillity was disturbed by a discontented faction, which insulted the feeble age of their sovereign, and impatiently expected the hour of his death. He died at length after a reign of fifty-six years, and the fortune of the Armenian monarchy expired with Tiridates. His lawful heir was driven into exile; the christian priests

* Julian, Opp. 1, p. 22.

CHAP. XVIII. were either murdered or expelled from their churches; the barbarous tribes of Albania were solicited to descend from their mountains; and two of the most powerful governors, usurping the ensigns or the powers of royalty, implored the assistance of Sapor, and opened the gates of their cities to the Persian garrisons. The christian party, under the guidance of the archbishop of Artaxata, the immediate successor of St. Gregory the illuminator, had recourse to the piety of Constantine. After the troubles had continued about three years, Antiochus, one of the officers of the household, executed with success the imperial commission of restoring Chosroes, the son of Tiridates, to the throne of his fathers, of distributing honours and rewards among the faithful servants of the house of Arsaces, and of proclaiming a general amnesty, which was accepted by the greater part of the rebellious satraps. But the Romans derived more honour than advantage from this revolution. Chosroes was a prince of a puny stature, and a pusillanimous spirit. Un- equal to the fatigues of war,averse to the society of mankind, he withdrew from his capital to a retired palace, which he built on the banks of the river Eleuthernus, and in the centre of a shady grove; where he consumed his vacant hours in the rural sports of hunting and lawking. To secure this inglorious ease, he submitted to the conditions of peace which Sapor condescended to impose; the payment of an annual tribute, and the restitution of the fertile province of Atropatene, which the courage of Tiridates, and the victorious arms of Galerius, had annexed to the Armenian monarchy.² C. H. & P. XVIII.

During the long period of the reign of Constantine, the provinces of the East were afflicted by the calamities of the Persian war. The irregular incursions of the light troops alternately spread terror and devastation beyond the Tigris, and beyond the Euphrates, from the gates of Ctesiphon to those of Antioch; and this active service was performed by the Arabs of the desert, who were divided in their interest and affections; some of their independent chiefs being enlisted in the party of Sapor, whilst others had engaged their doubtful fidelity to the emperor.³ The more grave and important operations of the war were conducted with equal vigour; and the armies of Rome and Persia encountered each other in nine bloody fields, in two of which Constantine himself commanded in person.⁴ The event of The Persian War, A.D. 257-260.

² Jullien, Quint. l. 9, p. 305-311. Mémoires de Gergius, t. 4, p. 99, l. 14, & l. 5, p. 224-226. The perfect agreement between the vague hints of the contemporary writers, and the circumstantial narrative of the religious historian, gives light to the former, and weight to the latter. For the death of Mithras it may be likewise observed, that the statue of Antiochus is found a few years before in a well known spot of inferior dignity. See Waddington, Cod. Theod. tom. 11, p. 216.

³ Antiquities (10), 4, gives a lively description of the wandering and predatory life of the Saracens, who descended from the mountains of Assyria to the banks of the Nile. It appears from the observations of Maffei, which James has related in an entertaining manner, that the high road between Belaa and Elenna was infested by these robbers. See Minutius, tom. 6, p. 228.

⁴ We shall take from Eutropius the general idea of the war 11. 10. A Persa totum annis et gratia perpetua, saepe captoque p. 139.

CHAP. the day was most commonly adverse to the Ro-XVIII. mans, but in the battle of Singara, their imprudent valour had almost achieved a signal and decisive victory. The stationary troops of Singara retired on the approach of Sapor, who passed the Tigris over three bridges, and occupied near the village of Hilleh an advantageous camp, which,
 by the labour of his numerous pioneers, he surrounded in one day with a deep ditch, and a lofty rampart. His formidable host, when it was drawn out in order of battle, covered the banks of the river, the adjacent heights, and the whole extent of a plain of above twelve miles, which separated the two armies. Both were alike impatient to engage; but the barbarians, after a slight resistance, fled in disorder; unable to resist, or desirous to weary, the strength of the heavy legions, who, fainting with heat and thirst, pursued them across the plain, and cut in pieces a line of cavalry, clothed in complete armour, which had been posted before the gates of the camp to protect their retreat. Constantius, who was hurried along in the pursuit, attempted, without effect, to restrain the ardour of his troops, by representing to them the dangers of the approaching night,

pelle, steriles arborum, rursus excrescentes, et longæque et cæcæ pæpente propterque prolium, cum, non quod sperni flagrant, &c. The second account is confirmed by the hints of Ammianus, Rufinus, and Zosimus. The two first authors of Julian, and the third edition of Eusebius, exhibit a more striking picture; but the resemblance of both these writers, after the death of Constantine, while it alludes us to the possession of the youth, describes their own character, and that of the emperor. The commentary of Apollonius on the first edition of Julian is perfectly correct. See likewise the judicious observations of Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iv, p. 428.

CHAP.
XVIII.
CONTINUED.

and the certainty of completing their success with the return of day. As they depended much more on their own valour, than on the experience or the abilities of their chief, they silenced by their clamours his timid remonstrances: and rushing with fury to the charge, filled up the ditch, broke down the rampart, and dispersed themselves through the tents to recruit their exhausted strength, and to enjoy the rich harvest of their labours. But the prudent Sapor had watched the moment of victory. His army, of which the greater part, securely posted on the heights, had been spectators of the action, advanced in silence, and under the shadow of the night; and his Persian archers, guided by the illumination of the camp, poured a shower of arrows on a disarmed and hesitating crowd. The sincerity of history* declares that the Romans were vanquished with a dreadful slaughter, and that the flying remnant of the legions was exposed to the most intolerable hardships. Even the tenderness of panegyric, confessing that the glory of the emperor was sullied by the disobedience of his soldiers, chooses to draw a veil over the circumstances of this melancholy retreat. Yet one of those venal orators, so jealous of the fame of Constantine, relates with amazing coolness an act of such incredible cruelty, as, in the judgment of posterity, must imprint a far deeper stain on the honour of the imperial name. The son of Sapor, the heir of his crown,

* Adversus Iulianum Constantini pugnam esse, non solum scriptis legimus, sed et oculis. Ammian. xxviii. l. Non dissimile Straboni, a. 10, and P. Bala, c. 21.

CHAP. had been made a captive in the Persian camp.
XVIII. The unhappy youth, who might have excited the compassion of the most savage enemy, was scourged, tortured, and publicly executed by the inhuman Romans.¹

Siege of Nisibis.

Whatever advantages might attend the arms of Sapor in the field, though nine repeated victories diffused among the nations the fame of his valour and conduct, he could not hope to succeed in the execution of his designs, while the fortified tower of Mesopotamia, and above all, the strong and ancient city of Nisibis, remained in the possession of the Romans. In the space of twelve years, Nisibis, which, since the time of Lucullus, had been deservedly esteemed the bulwark of the East, sustained three memorable sieges against the power of Sapor; and the disappointed monarch, after urging his attacks above sixty, eighty, and an hundred days, was thrice repulsed with loss and ignominy.* This large and populous city was situate about two days journey from the Tigris, in the midst of a pleasant and fertile plain at the foot of mount Masius. A treble inclosure of brick walls was defended by a deep ditch;† and

1. 2. 3. 4.
240, 241.

* Lilius, Orat. iii. p. 123. with Julian. Orat. i. p. 74. and Spalding's Commentary, p. 110.

† See Julian. Orat. i. p. 77; Orat. sup. 32, 33. with the Commentary of Spalding (p. 108, 109), who illustrates the circumstances, and ascertains the time, of the three sieges of Nisibis. That these are alludes is confirmed by Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs rom. ix. p. 442, 471, 482). Something is added from Zosimus, l. vi. p. 121, and the Alexandrian Chronicle, p. 106.

* Notae. P. 144, 144, 145, 146. Brown, and Tillemont to Lilius, Orat. iii. p. 124. Nisibis is now reduced to one hundred and fifty houses; the country kindly produces rice, and the fertile vineyards the intrepid assistance of Count Lucullus, and his garrison, was seconded by the desperate courage of the people. The citizens of Nisibis were animated by the exhortations of their bishop,* incured to arms by the presence of danger, and convinced of the intentions of Sapor to plant a Persian colony in their room, and to lead them away into distant and barbarous captivity. The event of the two former sieges elated their confidence and exasperated the haughty spirit of the great king, who advanced a third time towards Nisibis, at the head of the united forces of Persia and India. The ordinary machines invented to batter or undermine the walls, were rendered ineffectual by the superior skill of the Romans; and many days had vainly elapsed, when Sapor embraced a resolution, worthy of an eastern monarch, who believed that the elements themselves were subject to his power. At the stated season of the melting of the snows in Armenia, the river Mygdonius, which divides the plain and the city of Nisibis, forms, like the Nile,† an inundation as far as Mosul and the Tigris are covered with the ruins of towns and villages. See Niebuhr, Voyage, tom. V, p. 300, 301.

* The monster which Theodoret (l. ii. c. 26) ascribes to St. James, bishop of Kilas, were at least performed in a really common, the defence of his country. He opposed, on the walls, under the figure of the Roman emperor, and sent an army of giants to stop the progress of the elephants, and to dismantle the feet of the best Sambarites.

† Julius Onit, l. p. 21. Though Niebuhr (tom. iv. p. 367) assumes a very considerable wall to the Mygdonius, even which he was a bridge of communication, it is difficult, however, to understand the possibility of a rising current with a mighty river. There are many circumstances obscure, and almost unintelligible, in the description of these stupendous warlike works.

CHAPTER XVIII.
over the adjacent country. By the labour of the Persians, the course of the river was stopt below the town, and the waters were confined on every side by solid mounds of earth. On this artificial lake, a fleet of armed vessels, filled with soldiers, and with engines which discharged stones of five hundred pounds weight, advanced in order of battle, and engaged, almost upon a level, the troops which defended the ramparts. The irresistible force of the waters was alternately fatal to the contending parties, till at length a portion of the walls, unable to sustain the accumulated pressure, gave way at once, and exposed an ample breach of one hundred and fifty feet. The Persians were instantly driven to the assault, and the fate of Nisibis depended on the event of the day. The heavy-armed cavalry, who led the van of a deep column, were embarrassed in the mud, and great numbers were drowned in the unseen holes which had been filled by the rushing waters. The elephants, made furious by their wounds, increased the disorder, and trampled down thousands of the Persian archers. The great king, who, from an exalted throne, beheld the misfortunes of his arms, sounded, with reluctant indignation, the signal of the retreat, and suspended for some hours the prosecution of the attack. But the vigilant citizens improved the opportunity of the night; and the returned day discovered a new wall of six feet in height, rising every moment to fill up the interval of the breach. Notwithstanding the disappointment of his hopes, and the loss of more than twenty thousand men, Sapor still pressed the reduction of Nisibis, with an obstinate firmness, which could have yielded only to the necessity of defending the eastern provinces of Persia against a formidable invasion of the Massagete.² Alarmed by this intelligence, he hastily relinquished the siege, and marched with rapid diligence from the banks of the Tigris to those of the Oxus. The danger and difficulties of the Scythian war engaged him soon afterwards to conclude, or at least to observe, a truce with the Roman emperor, which was equally grateful to both princes; as Constantius himself, after the death of his two brothers, was involved, by the revolutions of the West, in a civil contest, which required and seemed to exceed, the most vigorous exertion of his undivided strength.

After the partition of the empire, three years had scarcely elapsed before the sons of Constantine seemed impatient to convince mankind that they were incapable of contenting themselves with the dominions which they were unqualified to govern. The eldest of those princes soon complained, that he was defrauded of his just proportion of the spoils of their murdered kinsmen; and though he might yield to the superior guilt and merit of Constantine, he exacted from Constant the cession of the African provinces, as an equivalent for the rich countries of Macedonia and Greece, which his brother had acquired

Civil war,
and death
of Constantine,
a. d. 338.
March.

² We are obliged to Zosimus (lib. ii. c. xliii. p. 115) for this term-ent of the Massagete, which is perfectly consistent with the general series of events, to which we are daily led by the broken history of Alexander.

CHAPTER
XVIII.

by the death of Dalmatius. The want of sincerity, which Constantine experienced in a tedious and fruitless negotiation, exasperated the fierceness of his temper; and he eagerly listened to those favourites, who suggested to him that his honour, as well as his interest, was concerned in the prosecution of the quarrel. At the head of a tumultuary band, suited for rapine rather than for conquest, he suddenly broke into the dominions of Constant, by the way of the Julian Alps, and the country round Aquileia felt the first effects of his resentment. The measures of Constant, who then resided in Dacia, were directed with more prudence and ability. On the news of his brother's invasion, he detached a select and disciplined body of his Illyrian troops, proposing to follow them in person, with the remainder of his forces. But the conduct of his lieutenants soon terminated the unnatural contest. By the artful appearances of flight, Constantine was betrayed into an ambuscade, which had been concealed in a wood, where the rash youth, with a few attendants, was surprised, surrounded, and slain. His body, after it had been found in the obscure stream of the Alsa, obtained the honour of an imperial sepulchre; but his provinces transferred their allegiance to the emperor, who, refusing to admit his elder brother Constantius to any share in these new acquisitions, maintained the undisputed possession of more than two-thirds of the Roman empire.*

* The causes and the events of this civil war have related with much propriety and exactness. I have closely followed Tac-

The fate of Constantine himself was delayed about ten years longer, and the revenge of his brother's death was reserved for the more ignoble hand of a domestic traitor. The pernicious tendency of the system introduced by Constantine was displayed in the feeble administration of his sons; who, by their vices and weakness, soon lost the esteem and affections of their people. The pride assumed by Constantine, from the unmerited success of his arms, was rendered more contemptible by his want of abilities and application. His fond partiality towards some German captives, distinguished only by the charms of youth, was an object of scandal to the people; and Magnentius, an ambitious soldier, who was himself of barbarian extraction, was encouraged by the public discontent to assert the honour of the Roman name.
The chosen bands of Jovians and Herculians, who acknowledged Magnentius as their leader, maintained the most respectable and important agents, and the younger Carter. The company had to leave before dawn. Nevertheless, pronounced on the death of Constantine, might have been very distinctive. But perhaps and later parts engaged the agents to consider them as a group of the same.

[illegible]

S. fulvus, tent. l. and in Annals, l. 34, p. 128. Taken on February 1. There is reason to believe that Magnolius was born in some of those leprosy colonies which Countess de Flabian had established in North and this theory, viz. 2, p. 128. His relations may resemble in the general and of Leontide, the famous Roman de Magnolius, who could persuade the good people of England, that he, a leprosy sufferer by birth, had taken arms to deliver them from foreign tyrants.

CHAP.
XVIII.

station in the imperial camp. The friendship of Marcellinus, count of the sacred largesses, supplied with a liberal hand the means of seduction. The soldiers were convinced by the most specious arguments, that the republic summoned them to break the bonds of hereditary servitude: and, by the choice of an active and vigilant prince, to reward the same virtues which had raised the ancestors of the degenerate Constant from a private condition to the throne of the world. As soon as the conspiracy was ripe for execution, Marcellinus, under the pretence of celebrating his son's birth-day, gave a splendid entertainment to the illustrious and honourable persons of the court of Gaul, which then resided in the city of Autun. The intemperance of the feast was artfully protracted till a very late hour of the night; and the unsuspecting guests were tempted to indulge themselves in a dangerous and guilty freedom of conversation. On a sudden the doors were thrown open, and Magnentius, who had retired for a few moments, returned into the apartment, invested with the diadem and purple. The conspirators instantly saluted him with the titles of Augustus and emperor. The surprise, the terror, the intoxication, the ambitious hopes, and the mutual ignorance of the rest of the assembly, prompted them to join their voices to the general acclamation. The guards hastened to take the oath of fidelity: the gates of the town were shut; and before the dawn of day, Magnentius became master of the troops and treasure of the palace and city of Autun. By his secrecy and diligence he entertained some hopes of surprising the person of Constans, who was pursuing in the adjacent forest his favourite amusement of hunting, or perhaps some pleasures of a more private and criminal nature. The rapid progress of fame allowed him, however, an instant for flight, though the desertion of his soldiers and subjects deprived him of the power of resistance. Before he could reach a sea-port in Spain, where he intended to embark, he was overtaken near Helena,* at the foot of the Pyrenees, by a party of light cavalry whose chief, regardless of the sanctity of a temple, executed his commission by the murder of the son of Constantine.^b

CHAP.
XVIII.

As soon as the death of Constans had decided this easy but important revolution, the example of the court of Autun was imitated by the provinces of the West. The authority of Magnentius was acknowledged through the whole extent of the two great prefectures of Gaul and Italy; and the usurper prepared, by every act of oppression, to collect a treasure, which might discharge the obligation of an immense donative, and supply the expences of a civil war. The martial countries

Magnentius and Valentinian murder the people, a. d. 355, March 2.

* This ancient city had more frequently under the name of Eborac (Eboracæ) than of Eborac. The foundation of Constantine gave it new splendour, and his mother's name. Helms (p. 141) called Eborac the seat of a bishop, who long afterwards transferred his residence to York, the capital of modern Britain. See d'Anville Notice de l'Académie des Sciences, p. 380. Longueville Description de la France, p. 222, and the Maria Hispanica, l. 1, c. 2.

^b Zosimus, l. 2, p. 119, 120. Zonaras, tom. ii, l. 21, p. 12, and the Althimatus.

CHAP.
XVIII.

of Illyricum, from the Danube to the extremity of Greece, had long obeyed the government of Vetrano, an aged general, beloved for the simplicity of his manners, and who had acquired some reputation by his experience and services in war.* Attached by habit, by duty, and by gratitude, to the house of Constantine, he immediately gave the strongest assurances to the only surviving son of his late master, that he would expose, with undivided fidelity, his person and his troops, to inflict a just revenge on the traitors of Gaul. But the legions of Vetrano were seduced rather than provoked by the example of rebellion; their leader soon betrayed a want of firmness or a want of sincerity; and his ambition desired a specious pretence from the approbation of the princess Constantina. That cruel and aspiring woman, who had obtained from the great Constantine her father the rank of Augusta, placed the diadem with her own hands on the head of the Illyrian general; and seemed to expect from his victory the accomplishment of those unbounded hopes, of which she had been disappointed by the death of her husband Maximianus. Perhaps it was without the consent of Constantine, that the new emperor formed a necessary, though dishonourable, alliance with the usurper of the West,

* Eusebius (c. 10) describes Vetrano with more respect, and probably with more truth, than either of the two Victors. Vetrano was here of obscure parentage, a mercenary general of Moesia, and it would seem that his attachment to Constantine, after his elevation, he retained till his death.

whose purple was so recently stained with her brother's blood.*

The intelligence of these important events, which so deeply affected the honour and safety of the imperial house, recalled the arms of Constantine from the inglorious prosecution of the Persian war. He recommended the care of the East to his lieutenants, and afterwards to his cousin Gallus, whom he raised from a prison to a throne; and marched towards Europe, with a mind agitated by the conflict of hope and fear, of grief and indignation. On his arrival at Heraclea in Thrace, the emperor gave audience to the ambassadors of Magnentius and Vetranio. The first author of the conspiracy, Marcellinus, who in some measure had bestowed the purple on his new master, boldly accepted this dangerous commission: and his three colleagues were selected from the illustrious personages of the state and army. These deputies were instructed to soothe the resentment, and to alarm the fears, of Constantine. They were empowered to offer him the friendship and alliance of the western princes, to cement their union by a double marriage; of Constantine with the daughter of Magnentius, and of Magnentius himself with the ambitious Constantine: and to acknowledge in the treaty the pre-eminence of rank which might justly be claimed by the emperor of the East. Should pride and mistaken piety urge him to refuse these equi-

CHAP.
XVIII.

Constantine involvement of war.
A. D. 324.

* The incident, beginning Constantine of Vetranio is described by Julius in the first epistle, and accurately explained by Eusebius, who discovers the situation and behaviour of Constantine.

CHAP.
XVIII.

table conditions, the ambassadors were ordered to expatiate on the inevitable ruin which must attend his rashness, if he ventured to provoke the sovereigns of the West to exert their superior strength; and to employ against him that valour, those abilities, and those legions, to which the house of Constantine had been indebted for so many triumphs. Such propositions and such arguments appeared to deserve the most serious attention; the answer of Constantius was deferred till the next day; and as he had reflected on the importance of justifying a civil war in the opinion of the people, he thus addressed his council, who listened with real or affected credulity: "Last night," said he, "after I retired to rest, the shade of the great Constantine, embracing the corpse of my murdered brother, rose before my eyes; his well-known voice awakened me to revenge, forbade me to despair of the republic, and assured me of the success and immortal glory which would crown the justice of my arms." The authority of such a vision, or rather of the prince who alleged it, silenced every doubt, and excluded all negotiation. The ignominious terms of peace were rejected with disdain. One of the ambassadors of the tyrant was dismissed with the haughty answer of Constantius; his colleagues, as unworthy of the privileges of the law of nations, were put in irons; and the contending powers prepared to wage an implacable war.*

* See Peter the Patriarch, in the Excerpta Legationum, p. 27.

Such was the conduct, and such perhaps was the duty, of the brother of Constant towards the perfidious usurper of Gaul. The situation and character of Vetranio admitted of milder measures; and the policy of the eastern emperor was directed to disunite his antagonist, and to separate the forces of Illyricum from the cause of rebellion. It was an easy task to deceive the frankness and simplicity of Vetranio, who, fluctuating some time between the opposite views of honour and interest, displayed to the world the insincerity of his temper, and was insensibly engaged in the snares of an artful negotiation. Constantius acknowledged him as a legitimate and equal colleague in the empire, on condition that he would renounce his disgraceful alliance with Magnentius, and appoint a place of interview on the frontiers of their respective provinces; where they might pledge their friendship by mutual vows of fidelity, and regulate by common consent the future operations of the civil war. In consequence of this agreement, Vetranio advanced to the city of Sardica,¹ at the head of twenty thousand horse, and of a more numerous body of infantry; a power so far superior to the forces of Constantius, that the Illyrian emperor appeared to command the life and fortunes of his rival, who, depending on the success of his private negotiations, had seduced the troops, and undermined

CHAP.
XVIII.De pace
Vetranio,
c. 23.
Dec. 24.

¹ Zosimus, lib. 2, c. 23, p. 18. The position of Sardica, near the modern city of Sophia, appears better suited to this interview than the situation of either Nisus or Simliss, where it is placed by Zosimus, Hieronymus, and Socrates.

CHAP.
XVIII.

the throne, of Valerian. The chiefs, who had secretly embraced the party of Constantius, prepared in his favour a public spectacle, calculated to discover and inflame the passions of the multitude.* The united armies were commanded to assemble in a large plain near the city. In the centre, according to the rules of ancient discipline, a military tribunal, or rather scaffold, was erected, from whence the emperors were accustomed, on solemn and important occasions, to harangue the troops. The well-ordered ranks of Romans and barbarians, with drawn swords, or with erected spears, the squadrons of cavalry, and the cohorts of infantry, distinguished by the variety of their arms and ensigns, formed an immense circle round the tribunal; and the attentive silence which they preserved was sometimes interrupted by loud bursts of clamour or of applause. In the presence of this formidable assembly, the two emperors were called upon to explain the situation of public affairs; the precedence of rank was yielded to the royal birth of Constantius; and though he was indifferently skilled in the arts of rhetoric, he acquitted himself, under these difficult circumstances, with firmness, dexterity, and eloquence. The first part of his oration seemed to be pointed only against the tyrant of Gaul; but while he tragically lamented the cruel murder of Constantine, he insinuated, that none, except a brother, could claim a right to the throne.

* See the two Restitutions of Julian, particularly p. 314 and 320, vol. 3. in p. 193. The Orations narrative of the bloody part of the illustration of the Orations, but vague, description of the throne.

cession of his brother. He displayed, with some complacency, the glories of his imperial race; and recalled to the memory of the troops, the valour, the triumphs, the liberality of the great Constantine, to whose service they had engaged their allegiance by an oath of fidelity, which the ingratitude of his most favoured servants had tempted them to violate. The officers, who surrounded the tribunal, and were instructed to act their parts in this extraordinary scene, confessed the irresistible power of reason and eloquence, by saluting the emperor Constantine as their lawful sovereign. The contagion of loyalty and repentance was communicated from rank to rank; till the plain of Sardica resounded with the universal acclamation of "Away with these upstart usurpers! Long life and victory to the son of Constantine! Under his banners alone we will fight and conquer." The shout of thousands, their menacing gestures, the fierce clashing of their arms, astounded and subdued the courage of Vetranio, who stood, amidst the defection of his followers, in anxious and silent suspense. Instead of embracing the last refuge of generous despair, he tamely submitted to his fate; and taking the diadem from his head, in the view of both armies, fell prostrate at the feet of his conqueror. Constantine used his victory with prudence and moderation; and raising from the ground the aged suppliant, whom he affected to style by the endearing name of father, he gave him his hand to descend from the throne. The city of Prusa was assigned for the exile or retirement of the abdi-

CHAP.
XVIII

cated monarch, who lived six years in the enjoyment of ease and affluence. He often expressed his grateful sense of the goodness of Constantine, and, with a very amiable simplicity, advised his benefactor to resign the sceptre of the world, and to seek for content (where alone it could be found) in the peaceful obscurity of a private condition.¹

Stakes set against Magen-tius.
i. n. 331.

The behaviour of Constantius on this memorable occasion was celebrated with some appearance of justice; and his courtiers compared the studied orations which a Pericles or a Demosthenes addressed to the populace of Athens, with the victorious eloquence which had persuaded an armed multitude to desert and depose the object of their partial choice.² The approaching contest with Magnentius was of a more serious and bloody kind. The tyrant advanced by rapid marches to encounter Constantius, at the head of a numerous army, composed of Gauls and Spaniards, of Franks and Saxons; of those provincials who supplied the strength of the legions, and of those barbarians who were dreaded as the most formidable enemies of the republic. The prietis clapsit electio. Ac. Augustus Victor, Julius, and Theodorus lib. vii. and viii.* where this episode with all the artificial and partly eulogizing of their character.

¹ The younger Victor assigns to his exile the emphatical appellation of "Voluptarium exilium." Scriptor. l. ii. c. 28; to that further for the correspondence with the emperor, which would seem to prove, that Victor was, indeed, proper ad gloriosam simplicitatem.

² Euseb. Constantius *Secundum illi deferentem imperio in patriam suam reversus. Quo gloriæ post annum imperium nulli pro-

fertile plains* of the Lower Pannonia, between the Drave, the Save, and the Danube, presented a spacious theatre; and the operations of the civil war were protracted during the summer months by the skill or timidity of the combatants.[†] Constantius had declared his intention of deciding the quarrel in the fields of Cibalæ, a name that would animate his troops by the remembrance of the victory which, on the same auspicious ground, had been obtained by the arms of his father Constantine. Yet by the impregnable fortifications with which the emperor encompassed his camp, he appeared to decline, rather than to invite, a general engagement. It was the object of Magnentius to tempt or to compel his adversary to relinquish this advantageous position; and he employed, with that view, the various marches, evolutions, and stratagems, which the knowledge of the art of war could suggest to an experienced officer. He carried by assault the important town of Siscia; made an attack on the city of Sirmium, which lay in the rear of the imperial camp; attempted to force a passage over the Save into the eastern provinces of

* Wattageon (p. 118) traversed the Lower Hungary and Sclavonia at a time when they were reduced almost to a desert, by the perpetual hostilities of the Turks and Capatains. Yet he mentions with admiration the incomparable fertility of the soil; and observed that the height of the grass was sufficient to conceal a loaded waggon from the sight. See likewise Belzoni's Travels, in Hardin's Collection, vol. II, p. 168, &c.

† Zosimus gives a very large account of the war and the negotiations (b. II, p. 113-130). But as he mentions himself a spectator and a politician, his narrative must be weighed with circumspection and received with caution.

CHAP. XVIII.
Illyricum; and cut in pieces a numerous detachment, which he had allured into the narrow passes of Adarné. During the greater part of the summer, the tyrant of Gaul shewed himself master of the field. The troops of Constantius were harassed and depleted; his reputation declined in the eye of the world; and his pride condescended to solicit a treaty of peace, which would have resigned to the assassin of Constantius the sovereignty of the provinces beyond the Alps. These offers were enforced by the eloquence of Philip, the imperial ambassador; and the council as well as the army of Magnentius were disposed to accept them. But the haughty usurper, careless of the remonstrances of his friends, gave orders that Philip should be detained as a captive, or at least as a hostage, while he dispatched an officer to reproach Constantius with the weakness of his reign, and to insult him by the promise of a pardon, if he would instantly abdicate the purple. "That" he should confide in the justice of his cause, "and the protection of an avenging Deity," was the only answer which honour permitted the emperor to return. But he was so sensible of the difficulties of his situation, that he no longer dared to retaliate the indignity which had been offered to his representative. The negotiation of Philip was not, however, ineffectual, since he determined Sylvanus the Frank, a general of merit and reputation, to desert with a considerable body of cavalry, a few days before the battle of Mursa.

The city of Mursa, or Essek, celebrated in modern times for a bridge of boats five miles in length, over the river Drave, and the adjacent morasses,¹ has been always considered as a place of importance in the wars of Hungary. Magnentius, directing his march towards Mursa, set fire to the gates, and, by a sudden assault, had almost scaled the walls of the town. The vigilance of the garrison extinguished the flames; the approach of Constantine left him no time to continue the operations of the siege; and the emperor soon removed the only obstacle that could embarrass his motions, by firing a body of troops which had taken post in an adjoining amphitheatre. The field of battle round Mursa was a naked and level plain: on this ground the army of Constantine formed, with the Drave on their right; while their left, either from the nature of their disposition, or from the superiority of their cavalry, extended far beyond the right flank of Magnentius.² The troops on both sides remained under arms, in anxious expectation, during the greatest part of the morning; and the son of Constantine, after animating his soldiers by an eloquent speech, retired into a church at some distance from the field of battle, and committed

¹ This remarkable bridge, which is built with beams, and supported on large wooden piles, was constructed, a. m. 1200, by Sultan Beldar, to facilitate the march of his armies into Hungary. See Strabo's Geography, and Hawking's System of Geography, vol. II. p. 302.

² This position, and the subsequent evolutions, are clearly, though erroneously, described by Julius Oros, l. p. 36.

CHAP.
XVIII.
Notes
Notes of Mursa,
a. m. 341,
Sept. 28.

CH. 8. P. to his generals the conduct of this decisive day.
 XVIII. They deserved his confidence by the valour and military skill which they exerted. They wisely began the action upon the left; and advancing their whole wing of cavalry in an oblique line, they suddenly wheeled it on the right flank of the enemy, which was unprepared to resist the impetuosity of their charge. But the Romans of the west soon rallied, by the habits of discipline;
 and the barbarians of Germany supported the renown of their national bravery. The engagement soon became general; was maintained with various and singular turns of fortune; and scarcely ended with the darkness of the night. The signal victory which Constantius obtained is attributed to the arms of his cavalry. His cuirassiers are described as so many many statues of steel, glittering with their steady armour, and breaking with their ponderous lances the firm array of the Gallic legions. As soon as the legions gave way, the lighter and more active squadrons of the second line rode sword in hand into the intervals, and completed the disorder. In the meanwhile the huge bodies of the Germans were exposed almost naked to the dexterity of the oriental archers;
 and whole troops of those barbarians were urged

* Vulpius Severus, l. ii. p. 402. The emperor passed the day in peace with Valens, the Asian ally of Maxus, who gained his confidence by concealing the success of the latter. M. DE THIERIAUX (Œuvres des Empereurs, tom. ix. p. 411b) very properly remarks the silence of Julian with regard to the supposed prowess of Constantius in the battle of Marston. The silence of Eutropius is likewise equal to the noise of the press and anthems of the day.

by anguish and despair to precipitate themselves into the broad and rapid stream of the Drave.*

CHAP.
XVIII.

The number of the slain was computed at fifty-four thousand men, and the slaughter of the conquerors was more considerable than that of the vanquished;† a circumstance which proves the obstinacy of the contest, and justifies the observation of an ancient writer, that the forces of the empire were consumed in the fatal battle of Mursa, by the loss of a veteran army, sufficient to defend the frontiers, or to add new triumphs to the glory of Rome.‡ Notwithstanding the invectives of a servile orator, there is not the least reason to believe that the tyrant deserted his own standard in the beginning of the engagement. He seems to have displayed the virtues of a general and of a soldier till the day was irrecoverably lost, and his camp in the possession of the enemy. Magnentius then consulted his

* Tacit., Hist. l. i. p. 36, 37; and Orat. l. i. p. 58, 59. Zosimus, lib. i. c. 13, p. 17. — Zosimus, l. ii. p. 126-127. The list of those celebrated the death of the emperor Maximian, who could discharge these armies at the same time, is an advantage which, according to his apprehension of military affairs, materially contributed to the victory of Constantine.

† According to Zosimus, Constantine had 50,000 men, but 20,000; and Magnentius had 14,000 out of 30,000. The same attacks of this account seem probable and authentic, but the numbers of the tyrant's army must have been smaller, either by the loss of his mercenaries. Magnentius had collected the whole force of the West, Gauls and Burgundians, into one formidable body, which cannot fairly be estimated at less than 100,000 men. Julian, Orat. l. i. p. 38, 39.

‡ In epistle 2, a strain of dissipated magnificence went, ad spem, et in hoc extremis illis, qui nullum triumphum possent celebrare, mutatis. Hieronymus, l. i. c. 13. The younger Victor expounds himself to the same effect.

CHAP.
XVIII.

safety, and throwing away the imperial ornaments, escaped with some difficulty from the pursuit of the light horse, who incessantly followed his rapid flight from the banks of the Drave to the foot of the Julian Alps.⁴

Conquest of Italy,
A. D. 402.

The approach of winter supplied the indolence of Constantius with specious reasons for deferring the prosecution of the war till the ensuing spring. Magnentius had fixed his residence in the city of Aquileia, and shewed a seeming resolution to dispute the passage of the mountains and morasses which fortified the confines of the Venetian province. The surprisal of a castle in the Alps by the secret march of the imperialists, could scarcely have determined him to relinquish the possession of Italy, if the inclinations of the people had supported the cause of their tyrant.⁵ But the memory of the cruelties exercised by his ministers, after the unsuccessful revolt of Nepotian, had left a deep impression of horror and resentment on the minds of the Romans. That rash youth, the son of the princess Eutropia, and the nephew of Constantine, had seen with indignation the sceptre of the West usurped by a perfidious barbarian.

⁴ On this occasion, we must prefer the transported valour of Zulung and Zosimus to the flattering assertions of Julian. The passage Victor paints the conduct of Magnentius in a disagreeable light. "Securitate vixit, sedis tumultu, et immoventi cunctis, et armis." "tamquam periculodum modicum speciali fortitudine." Is it not truly that in the battle of Muris his soldiers were governed by nature or by art? I should have been for the latter.

⁵ Julian. Oration. 1. p. 28. 39. In that place, however, as well as in Orosius ii. p. 42. he ascribes the general disposition of the senate, the people, and the soldiers of Italy, between the party of the usurper.

Arming a desperate troop of slaves and gladiators, he overpowered the whole guard of the domestic tranquillity of Rome, received the homage of the senate, and assuming the title of Augustus, precariously reigned during a tumult of twenty-eight days. The march of some regular forces put an end to his ambitious hopes: the rebellion was extinguished in the blood of Nepotian, of his mother Eutropia, and of his adherents; and the proscription was extended to all who had contracted a fatal alliance with the name and family of Constantine.* But as soon as Constantius, after the battle of Mursa, became master of the sea-coast of Dalmatia, a band of noble exiles, who had ventured to equip a fleet in some harbour of the Adriatic, sought protection and revenge in his victorious camp. By their secret intelligence with their countrymen, Rome and the Italian cities were persuaded to display the banners of Constantius on their walls. The grateful veterans, enriched by the liberality of the father, signalized their gratitude and loyalty to the son. The cavalry, the legions, and the auxiliaries of Italy, renewed their oath of allegiance to Constantius; and the murderer, alarmed by the general desertion, was compelled, with the remains of his faithful troops, to retire beyond the Alps into the

* The same Victor describes in a galling manner the miserable condition of Rome: "Vixit malitiam, inermem, sed et paucis, et sine ulla fide, ad preces dominorum, et ad supplicia, et ad omnia supplicia, et ad omnia supplicia, et ad omnia supplicia." Athenæus (lib. 1, p. 477) describes the fate of several senators, victims of the proscription. (Cass. lib. 2, p. 18) extends the cruelty of Maximilian, the implacable enemy of the house of Constantine.

C. H. & P. provinces of Gaul. The detachments, however, which were ordered either to press or to intercept the flight of Magnentius, conducted themselves with the usual imprudence of success: and allowed him, in the plains of Pavin, an opportunity of turning on his pursuers, and of gratifying his despair, by the carnage of a useless victory.*

THE pride of Magnentius was reduced, by repeated misfortunes, to sue, and to sue in vain, for peace. He first dispatched a senator, in whose abilities he confided, and afterwards several bishops, whose holy character might obtain a more favourable audience, with the offer of resigning the purple, and the promise of devoting the remainder of his life to the service of the emperor. But Constantius, though he granted fair terms of pardon and reconciliation to all who abandoned the standard of rebellion,† crossed his inflexible resolution to inflict a just punishment on the crimes of an assassin, whom he prepared to overwhelm on every side by the effort of his victorious arms. An imperial fleet acquired the easy possession of Africa and Spain; confirmed the wavering faith of the Moorish nations; and landed a considerable force, which passed the Pyrenees, and advanced towards Lyons, the last and fatal station of Magnentius.‡ The temper of the ty-

* Zosm. l. ii. p. 122. Victor in Epitome. The progress of Constantine, with little more candour, forget to mention the accidental defeat.

† Euseb. tom. ii. l. xii. p. 51. Julius, in several places of the two arches, expatiates on the clemency of Constantine to the rebels.

‡ Zosm. l. ii. p. 122. Julius, Orat. i. p. 40; ii. p. 74.

rant, which was never inclined to clemency, was urged by distress to exercise every act of oppression which could extort an immediate supply from the cities of Gaul.² Their patience was at length exhausted; and Treves, the seat of prætorian government, gave the signal of revolt, by shutting her gates against Decentius, who had been raised by his brother to the rank either of Cæsar or of Augustus.* From Treves, Decentius was obliged to retire to Sens, where he was soon surrounded by an army of Germans, whom the pernicious arts of Constantius had introduced into the civil dissensions of Rome.³ In the meantime, the imperial troops forced the passages of the Cottian Alps, and in the bloody combat of mount Seleucus irrevocably fixed the title of rebels on the party of Maguentius.⁴ He was un-

C H A P.
XVIII.

* * Ammian. vi. 6. Zosim. l. ii. p. 154. Julian, viii (Orat. 2, p. 48) inveighs against the cruel whims of the tyrant's despotism, tyrannica stulticia (Orat. l. p. 124) the oppressive edicts which were dictated by his whimsies, ut per his statuta. His subjects were compelled to purchase the tyrant's demands; a dishonest and dangerous species of property, which, in case of a revolution, might be imputed to them as a treasonable conspiracy.

* The uncle of Maguentius inherits the virtues of the vera Augusti, and of the Caesar. The Caesar was another brother, named Flavianus. See Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs rom. vi. p. 171.

² Julian Orat. l. p. 40; ii. p. 78, with Epiphanius, p. 263. His Commentary illustrates the transactions of this civil war. Mont Seleucus was a small place in the Cottian Alps, a few miles distant from Vagyonem, or Gap, an important city of Dauphiné. See d'Auvillle Noies de la Gaule, p. 461; and Languet's Description de la France, p. 571.

³ Zosimus, l. ii. p. 154. Julian Orat. x. p. 268, 269. The latter most vehemently smother this cruel and selfish policy of dissensions.

CHAP.
XVIII.

able to bring another army into the field; the fidelity of his guards was corrupted: and when he appeared in public to animate them by his exhortations, he was saluted with an unanimous shout of "Long live the emperor Constantine!" The tyrant, who perceived that they were preparing to deserve pardon and rewards by the sacrifice of the most obnoxious criminal, prevented their design by falling on his sword: a death more easy and more honourable than he could hope to obtain from the hands of an enemy, whose revenge would have been coloured with the specious pretence of justice and fraternal piety. The example of suicide was imitated by Decentius, who strangled himself on the news of his brother's death. The author of the conspiracy, Marcellinus, had long since disappeared in the battle of Muris,^a and the public tranquillity was confirmed by the execution of the surviving leaders of a guilty and unsuccessful faction. A severe inquisition was extended over all who, either from choice or from compulsion, had been involved in the cause of rebellion. Paul, surnamed Catena, from his sus-

^a Julian, vi. c. 1, p. 40. Zosimus, i. c. 11, p. 121. Sozomen, l. 2, c. 22. Socrates, l. 2, c. 1. The younger Victor describes his death with some harsh assumptions: "Tranquillus inter, ut sepius scripsi, valens malitiose in me atrociter effundens sanguinem." If we can give credit to Zosimus, the tyrant, before he expired, had the pleasure of murdering with his own hands his mother and his brother Decentius.

^b Julian (ibid., l. 1, p. 38, 39) seems at a loss to determine, whether he refused to behold the punishment of his crimes, whether he was drowned in the Rhene, or whether he was carried by the swelling streams from his bed of strife to his destined place of eternal torments.

perior skill in the judicial exercise of tyranny, was sent to explore the latent remains of the conspiracy in the remote province of Britain. The honest indignation expressed by Martin, vice prefect of the island, was interpreted as an evidence of his own guilt; and the governor was urged to the necessity of turning against his breast the sword with which he had been provoked to wound the imperial minister. The most innocent subjects of the West were exposed to exile and confiscation, to death and torture; and as the timid are always cruel, the mind of Constantius was inaccessible to mercy.³

CHAP.
XVIII.³ Ammon. 314, 34, 312, 16.

CHAP. XIX.

Constantine sole emperor.—Elevation and death of Gallus.—Danger and elevation of Julian.—Sarmatian and Persian wars.—Victories of Julian in Gaul.

CHAP.
XIX.

Views of this continue.

THE divided provinces of the empire were again united by the victory of Constantine; but as that feeble prince was destitute of personal merit, either in peace or war; as he feared his generals, and distrusted his ministers; the triumph of his arms served only to establish the reign of the eunuchs over the Roman world. Those unhappy beings, the ancient production of oriental jealousy and despotism,* were introduced into Greece and Rome by the contagion of Asiatic luxury.[†] Their progress was rapid; and the eunuchs, who, in the time of Augustus, had been abhorred, as the monstrous retinue of an Egyptian queen,[‡] were gradually admitted into the fa-

* Antiquities lib. xxi. c. 20. impious, the first province of western Asia to the cruel oppression of Kamlamides, who is supposed to have existed above nineteen hundred years before Christ. The use of eunuchs is of high antiquity; both in Asia and Egypt. They are mentioned in the law of Moses, Deuteronomy xxiii. 1. See Oughton, History of the Jews, lib. Part 1, l. 1, c. 2.

† Erasmianus diall. c. 10. in 2.

‡ Quæstiones utantur his regibus.

† Textus Erasmianus diall. 1, p. 10. 2.

This play is translated from Menander, and the original must have appeared soon after the Asiatic conquests of Alexander.

Alibi 1. 1. 1. 1. 1. 1.

See the epigram greek.

Orbis Curia 1, 1, and De ier ad ier.

families of magistrates, of senators, and of the emperors themselves.² Restrained by the severe edicts of Domitian and Nervæ, cherished by the pride of Diocletian, reduced to an humble station by the prudence of Constantine,³ they multiplied in the palaces of his degenerate sons, and insensibly acquired the knowledge, and at length the direction, of the secret comedy of Constantine. The aversion and contempt which mankind has so uniformly entertained for that imperfect species, appears to have degraded their character, and to have rendered them almost as incapable as they were supposed to be, of conceiving any generous sentiment, or of performing any worthy action.⁴ But the eunuchs were

By the word gods, the Romans very forcibly expressed their abhorrence of this mutilated constitution. The Greek appellation of antichrist, which is usually preserved, had a similar sound, and a more an-

⁴ The most early American Period, a freedom and pursuit of Liberty, in which France the support presidential name of the most remarkable rewards of military culture. The French, as President of the French employed a part of his wealth in building.

[illegible]

CHAP.
XIX.

skilled in the arts of flattery and intrigue; and they alternatively governed the mind of Constantine by his fears, his indolence, and his vanity.^a Whilst he viewed in a deceitful mirror the fair appearance of public prosperity, he slyly permitted them to intercept the complaints of the injured provinces, to accumulate immense treasures by the sale of justice and of honours; to disgrace the most important dignities, by the promotion of those who had purchased at their hands the powers of oppression;^b and to gratify their resentment against the few independent spirits, who arrogantly refused to solicit the protection of slaves. Of these slaves the most distinguished was the chamberlain Eusebius, who ruled the monarch and the palace with such absolute sway, that Constantine, according to the surmise of an impartial historian, possessed some credit with this haughty wretch. He had observed, in animals, that although the promise of extinction might tame their ungovernable ferocity, it did not diminish their strength or spirit; and he persecuted himself, that those who were separated from the rest of human kind, would be more closely attached to the person of their benefactor. But a long experience has contradicted the judgment of Cyrus. Some particular instances only seem of men distinguished by their fidelity, their valour, and their abilities; but if we examine the general history of Persia, India, and China, we shall find that the power of the eunuchs has uniformly implied the decline and fall of every dynasty.

^a See Numismatic Metastasis, l. xxi, s. 10; l. xxi, s. 4. The whole tenor of his impartial history serves to justify the invective of Macrobius, of Lilius, and of Julian the monk, who have blamed the cause of the evils of Constantinople.

^b Angelus Silesius attributes the negligence of his sovereign in trusting the government of the provinces, and the growth of the army, and concludes his history with a very bold observation, as it is likely that despotism under a feeble reign to attack the subjects than the monarch himself. "Ei regis debilius horis, ut imperatoris ipse debet uti." "spem horum perire, magis utitur solus."

favourite.¹ By his artful suggestions, the emperor was persuaded to subscribe the condemnation of the unfortunate Gallus, and to add a new crime to the long list of unnatural murders which pollute the honour of the house of Constantine.

When the two nephews of Constantine, Gallus and Julian, were saved from the fury of the soldiers, the former was about twelve, and the latter about six, years of age; and, as the eldest was thought to be of a sickly constitution, they obtained with the less difficulty a precarious and dependent life, from the affected pity of Constantine, who was sensible that the execution of these helpless orphans would have been esteemed, by all mankind, an act of the most deliberate cruelty.² Different cities of Ionia and Bithynia were assigned for the places of their exile and education; but, as soon as their growing years excited the jealousy of the emperor, he judged it more prudent to secure those unhappy youths in the strong castle of Marcellum, near Casarea. The treatment which they experienced during a six years confinement, was partly such as they could hope from a careful guardian, and partly such as they might dread from a suspicious ty-

CHAP.
XIX.

Education of Gallus
and Julian.

¹ Apud quem in viros non debemus nullum Constantium possit. Ammian. l. xviii. c. 4.

² Gregory Nazianzen (Orat. lii. p. 98) represents the apostles with his congratulations towards Basil, bishop of Argina, who had contrived to save his life; and we learn, though from a less respectable authority (Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iv. p. 119), that Julian was conveyed to the sanctuary of a church.

CHAP. rent.²⁹ Their prison was an ancient palace, the residence of the kings of Cappadocia; the situation was pleasant, the building stately, the inclosure spacious. They pursued their studies, and practised their exercises, under the tuition of the most skillful masters; and the numerous household appointed to attend, or rather to guard, the nephews of Constantine, was not unworthy of the dignity of their birth. But they could not disguise to themselves that they were deprived of fortune, of freedom, and of safety; secluded from the society of all whom they could trust or esteem, and condemned to pass their melancholy hours in the company of slaves, devoted to the commands of a tyrant, who had already injured them beyond the hope of reconciliation. At length, however, the emergencies of the state compelled the emperor, or rather his eunuchs, to invest Gallus, in the twenty-fifth year of his age, with the title of Cæsar, and to cement this political connection by his marriage with the princess Constantina. After a formal interview, in which the two princes mutually engaged their faith never to undertake any thing to the prejudice of each other, they repaired without delay to their respective stations. Constantine continued his march towards the west, and Gallus fixed his re-

Constantine declared Cæsar, A. D. 331, March 2.

²⁹ The most authentic account of the situation and advantages of Tiberias, is contained in the epistle of Marcianus, which he himself addressed to the senate and people of Athens. Ulpianus (lib. 1. Prænotatio), on the side of the Pigeons, and Proculus (l. vi. c. 1), on that of the Chalcidians, have preserved several interesting circumstances.

aidence at Antioch, from whence, with a delegated authority, he administered the five great dioceses of the eastern prefecture.* In this fortunate change, the new Caesar was not unmindful of his brother Julian, who obtained the honours of his rank, the appearance of liberty, and the restitution of an ample patrimony.†

The writers the most indulgent to the memory of Gallus, and even Julian himself, though he wished to cast a veil over the frailties of his brother, are obliged to confess that the Caesar was incapable of reigning. Transported from a prison to a throne, he possessed neither genius nor application, nor docility to compensate for the want of knowledge and experience. A temper naturally morose and violent, instead of being corrected, was soured by solitude and adversity; the remembrance of what he had endured, disposed him to retaliation rather than to sympathy; and the ungoverned sallies of his rage were often fatal to those who approached his person, or were subject to his power.‡ Constantian, his wife, is

Caesar
and his pretence
of Gallus.

* For the promotion of Gallus, see Adarian, Eusebius, and the two Victor. According to Palladius (Xiv. c. 15, Theophrastus, an Asian bishop, was the witness, and, as it were, the guarantor, of this solemn engagement. He suggested that Constantine with generous intentions, but M. de Tillemont (Hist. des Empereurs, tom. IV. p. 147) thinks it very improbable that an emperor should have possessed such virtue.

† Julian was at first permitted to prove his studies at Constantinople, but the reputation which he acquired soon excited the jealousy of Constantian; and the young prince was ordered to withdraw himself to the less conspicuous stages of Bithynia and Ionia.

‡ See Julian ad c. 22. p. 271. Joann. in Chron. Sirellus Victor, Eusebius, c. 14. I shall copy the words of Eusebius, who had been conscious how much he had to fear, CHAP. XIX. and how little he deserved to reign, selected for the objects of his resentment, the provincials accused of some imaginary treason, and his own courtiers, whom with more reason he suspected of incensing,

 by their secret correspondence, the timid and suspicious mind of Constantine. But he forgot that he was depriving himself of his only support, the affection of the people; whilst he furnished the malice of his enemies with the arms of truth, and afforded the emperor the fairest pretence of exacting the forfeit of his purple, and of his life.*

As long as the civil war suspended the fate of MANU-
 OF THE IM-PERIAL MI-NISTERS.
 17 & 218.
 the Roman world, Constantine disembled his knowledge of the weak and cruel administration to which his choice had subjected the East; and the discovery of some assassins, secretly dispatched to Antioch by the tyrant of Gaul, was employed to convince the public, that the emperor and the Caesar were united by the same interest, and pursued by the same enemies.[†] But when the victory was decided in favour of Constantine, his dependent colleague became less useful and less formidable. Every circumstance of his conduct was severely and suspiciously examined, and it was privately resolved, either to deprive Gallus of the

* De la Amiliana (l. 210, c. 1-7) a very simple detail of the execution of Gallus. His brother Zosime (p. 472) intimates that a party conspiracy had been formed against him; and Zonaras
l. 12, p. 130 the persons engaged in it a minister of considerable rank, and two chamber agents, who were resolved to make their fortune.

[†] Zonaras, l. cto. tom. ii, p. 17, 18. The assassins had ordered a great number of fugitives; but their design was discovered and repulsed by an old woman in whose cottage they lodged.

CHAP.
XIX.

purple, or at least to remove him from the indolent luxury of Asia to the hardships and dangers of a German war. The death of Theophilus, consular of the province of Syria, who in a time of scarcity had been massacred by the people of Antioch, with the connivance, and almost at the instigation, of Gallus, was justly resented, not only as an act of wanton cruelty, but as a dangerous insult on the supreme majesty of Constantine. Two ministers of illustrious rank, Domitian, the oriental prefect, and Montias, questor of the palace, were empowered by a special commission to visit and reform the state of the East. They were instructed to behave towards Gallus with moderation and respect, and, by the gentlest arts of persuasion, to engage him to comply with the invitation of his brother and colleague. The rashness of the prefect disappointed these prudent measures, and hastened his own ruin, as well as that of his enemy. On his arrival at Antioch, Domitian passed disdainfully before the gates of the palace, and alleging a slight pretence of indisposition, continued several days in sullen retirement, to prepare an inflammatory memorial, which he transmitted to the imperial court. Yielding at length to the pressing solicitations of Gallus, the prefect condescended to take his seat in council; but his first step was to signify a concise and haughty mandate, importing that the Caesar should immediately repair to Italy, and threatening that he himself would punish his delay or hesitation, by suspending the usual allowance of his household. The nephew and daughter of Constantine, who could ill brook the insolence of a subject, expressed their resentment by instantly delivering Domitian to the custody of a guard. The quarrel still admitted of some terms of accommodation. They were rendered impracticable by the imprudent behaviour of Montius, a statesman, whose art and experience were frequently betrayed by the levity of his disposition.¹ The questor reproached Gallus in haughty language, that a prince who was scarcely authorized to remove a municipal magistrate should presume to imprison a prætorian præfect; convoked a meeting of the civil and military officers; and required them, in the name of their sovereign, to defend the person and dignity of his representatives. By this rash declaration of war, the impatient temper of Gallus was provoked to embrace the most desperate counsels. He ordered his guards to stand to their arms, assembled the populace of Antioch, and recommended to their zeal the care of his safety and revenge. His commands were too fatally obeyed. They rudely seized the præfect and the questor, and tying their legs together with ropes, they dragged them through the streets of the city, inflicted a thousand insults and a thousand wounds on these unhappy victims, and at last precipitated their ¹ In the present text of Arminianus, we read, super, quidem, sed ad hocque propulsi; which forms a sequence of contradictory assertions. With the aid of our old manuscripts, Valentin has rectified the text of three MSS., and we perceive a ray of light in the solemn truth of the word super. If we venture to change insolens into insolent, this alteration of a single letter will render the whole passage clear and consistent.

CHAP. mingled and lifeless bodies into the stream of the XIX. Orontes.*

*Danger was imminent
 to Gallus.*

After such a deed, whatever might have been the designs of Gallus, it was only in a field of battle that he could assert his innocence with any hope of success. But the mind of that prince was formed of an equal mixture of violence and weakness. Instead of assuming the title of Augustus, instead of employing in his defence the troops and treasures of the East, he suffered himself to be deceived by the asserted tranquillity of Constantius, who, leaving him the vain pageantry of a court, imperceptibly recalled the veteran legions from the provinces of Asia. But as it still appeared dangerous to arrest Gallus in his capital, the slow and safe arts of dissimulation were practised with success. The frequent and pressing epistles of Constantius were filled with professions of confidence and friendship; exhorting the Cæsar to discharge the duties of his high station, to relieve his colleague from a part of the public cares, and to assist the West by his presence, his counsels, and his arms. After so many reciprocal injuries, Gallus had reason to fear and to distrust. But he had neglected the opportunities of flight and of resistance; he was seduced by the flattering assurances of the tribune Scudilo, who, under the semblance of a rough soldier, disguised the

* Instead of being obliged to collect, diffuse, and improve facts from various sources, we are enabled here to follow the full career of the history of dissimulation, and soon may refer to the serious and dark chapters of his government. Philostorgius, History, lib. ii. c. 100. Although painful to Gallus, should not be hastily concluded.

most artful insinuation: and he depended on the credit of his wife Constantia, till the unseasonable death of that princess completed the ruin in which he had been involved by her impetuous passions.*

CHAP.
XIX.

After a long delay, the reluctant Caesar set for-<sup>His disgust and dread,</sup> wards on his journey to the imperial court. From Antioch (6 Hadrinople, he traversed the wide<sup>as 714, Eusebius.</sup> extent of his dominions with a numerous and stately train; and as he laboured to conceal his apprehensions from the world, and perhaps from himself, he entertained the people of Constantinople with an exhibition of the games of the circus. The progress of the journey might, however, have warned him of the impending danger.
In all the principal cities he was met by ministers of confidence, commissioned to seize the offices of government, to observe his motions, and to prevent the hasty sallies of his despair. The persons dispatched to secure the provinces which he left behind, passed him with cold salutations, or reflected disdain; and the troops, whose station lay along the public road, were studiously removed on his approach, lest they might be tempted to offer their swords for the service of a civil war.†

* She had prevailed her husband's but died of a fever on the road, at a little place in Bithynia, called Constantia Galatensis.

† The Thracian legions, which were then quartered at Hadrinople, sent a deputation to Gallus, with a notice of their motions. Ammian. l. iv. c. 11. The Notitia (c. 6, 22, 26, 28, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100) mentions three several legions which bore the name of Thracian. The first at M. de Valpurga, is denoted a desperate though celebrated legion, but composed here, on the slightest grounds, to deny the existence of a Thracian legion in the Roman armies. See Orellanus Pal-ladii, Not. p. 414, quarto edition.

CHAP.
XIX.

After Gallus had been permitted to repose himself a few days at Hadrianople, he received a mandate, expressed in the most haughty and absolute style, that his splendid retinue should halt in that city, while the Cæsar, himself with only ten post-carriages, should hasten to the imperial residence at Milan. In this rapid journey, the profound respect which was due to the brother and colleague of Constantine, was insensibly changed into rude familiarity; and Gallus, who discovered in the countenances of the attendants, that they already considered themselves as his guards, and might soon be employed as his executioners, began to accuse his fatal rashness, and to recollect with terror and remorse the conduct by which he had provoked his fate. The dissimulation which had hitherto been preserved, was laid aside at Petovio in Pannonia. He was conducted to a palace in the suburbs, where the general Barbatio, with a select band of soldiers, who could neither be moved by pity, nor corrupted by rewards, expected the arrival of his illustrious victim. In the close of the evening he was arrested, ignominiously stripped of the ensigns of Cæsar, and hurried away to Pola in Istria, a sequestered prison which had been so recently polluted with royal blood. The horror which he felt was soon increased by the appearance of his implacable enemy the eunuch Eusebius, who, with the assistance of a notary and a tribune, proceeded to interrogate him concerning the administration of the East. The Cæsar sunk under the weight of sinne and guilt, confessed all the criminal actions, and all the treasonable designs with which he was charged: and by imputing them to the advice of his wife, exasperated the indignation of Constantine, who reviewed with partial prejudice the minutes of the examination. The emperor was easily convinced, that his own safety was incompatible with the life of his cousin: the sentence of death was signed, dispatched, and executed; and the nephew of Constantine, with his hands tied behind his back, was beheaded in prison like the vilest malefactor.* Those who are inclined to palliate the cruelties of Constantine, assert that he soon relented, and endeavoured to recall the bloody mandate: but that the second messenger entrusted with the reprieve, was detained by the eunuchs, who dreaded the unforgiving temper of Gallus, and were desirous of reuniting to their empire the wealthy provinces of the East.†

Besides the reigning emperor, Julian alone The Roman survived, of all the numerous posterity of Constantine Chlorus. the only and The misfortune of his royal survivor birth involved him in the disgrace of Gallus. From his retirement in the happy country of Ionia, he was conveyed under a strong guard to

* See the complete narrative of the journey and death of Gallus in Ammianus, l. 11, c. 11. Julian complains that his brother was put to death without a trial: attempts to justify, or at least to excuse, the cruel revenge which he had inflicted on his enemies; but seems at last to acknowledge that he might justly have been deprived of the purple.

† Palladius, l. 17, c. 1. Eusebius, l. xiii, tom. ii, p. 13. But the horror was passed before an Asian monarch, and the issue transmitted, without delay or reflection, without he being in the way of the execution.

CHAP.
XIX.

the court of Milan: where he languished above seven months, in the continual apprehension of suffering the same ignominious death, which was daily inflicted, almost before his eyes, on the friends and adherents of his persecuted family. His looks, his gestures, his silence, were scrutinized with malignant curiosity, and he was perpetually assaulted by enemies, whom he had never offended, and by arts to which he was a stranger.* But in the school of adversity, Julian sensibly acquired the virtues of firmness and discretion. He defended his honour, as well as his life, against the cunning subtleties of the eunuchs, who endeavoured to extort some declaration of his sentiments: and whilst he cautiously suppressed his grief and resentment, he nobly disdained to flatter the tyrant, by any seeming approbation of his brother's murder. Julian most devoutly ascribes his miraculous deliverance to the protection of the gods, who had exempted his innocence from the sentence of destruction pronounced by their justice against the impious house of Constantine.† As the most effectual instrument of their providence, he grate-

* See Augustinus Martellus, l. xi, c. 1, 3-8. Julian himself, in his epistle to the Athenians, shows a very freely and just picture of his oppressors, and of his sentiments. He shows, however, a very strong propensity to calumny, by insinuating, though in obscure terms, that they himself bore a part in a period which cannot be so easily reconciled with the truth of chronology.

† Julian has marked the crimes and misdeeds of the family of Constantine after the original text, which is happily corrected and expressly stated. It forms the conclusion of the second volume, from whence it has been selected and translated by the Abbé de St. Martin. Vie de Julien, tom. ii, p. 383-408.

fully acknowledged the steady and generous friendship of the emperor. Eusebia,² a woman of beauty and merit, who, by the ascendancy which she had gained over the mind of her husband, counterbalanced, in some measure, the powerful conspiracy of the eunuchs. By the intercession of his patroness, Julian was admitted into the imperial presence; he pleaded his cause with a decent freedom, he was heard with favour: and, notwithstanding the efforts of his enemies, who urged the danger of sparing an avenger of the blood of Gallus, the milder sentiment of Eusebia prevailed in the council. But the effects of a second interview were derided by the eunuchs; and Julian was advised to withdraw for a while into the neighbourhood of Milan, till the emperor thought proper to assign the city of Athens for the place of his honourable exile. As he had discovered, from his earliest youth, a propensity, or rather passion, for the language, the manners, the learning, and the religion of the Greeks, he obeyed with pleasure an order so agreeable to his wishes. Far from the tumult of arms and the treachery of courts, he spent six months amidst the groves of the academy, in a free intercourse with the philosophers of the age, who studied to cultivate the genius, to encourage the vanity, and to inflame the devotion of their royal pupil. Their labours were not unsuccessful; and Julian inviolably preserved for Athens that tender regard, which seldom fails to arise in a liberal mind, from the recollection of the place where it has discovered and exercised its growing powers. The gentleness and affability of manners, which his temper suggested, and his situation imposed, insensibly engaged the affections of the strangers, as well as citizens, with whom he conversed. Some of his fellow-students might perhaps examine his behaviour with an eye of prejudice and aversion; but Julian established, in the school of Athens, a general prepossession in favour of his virtues and talents, which was soon diffused over the Roman world.*

² Eusebia is sister of Theodosius by Marcianus, of a noble family, and the daughter as well as sister of Julian. Her marriage with the emperor was celebrated in the year 324. In a circular letter the historians of all parties agree in her praise. See them both, as collected by Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. IV. p. 121-124.

CHAP.
XIX.

Resided at Milan.

Whilst his hours were passed in studious retirement, the empress, resolute to achieve the generous design which she had undertaken, was not unmindful of the care of his fortune. The death of the late Cæsar had left Constantine invested with the sole command, and oppressed by the accumulated weight of a mighty empire. Before the wounds of civil discord could be healed, the provinces of Gaul were overwhelmed by a deluge of barbarians. The Sarmatians no longer re-

* Idemius and Gregory Nazianzen have rehearsed the story as well as the powers of their eloquence, to represent Julian as the best of heroes, or the worst of tyrants. Gregory was his fellow-student at Athens; and the symptoms which he so tragically describes, of the furious sickness of the apostate, amount only to some bodily indisposition, and to some peevishness in his speech and manner. His passions, however, that he does describe and forecast, the calamities of the church and state (Greg. Nazianzen, Oration, vi. p. 111. 112).

spected the barrier of the Danube. The impunity of rapine had increased the boldness and numbers of the wild Saurians; these robbers descended from their craggy mountains to ravage the adjacent country, and had even presumed, though without success, to besiege the important city of Seleucia, which was defended by a garrison of three Roman legions. Above all, the Persian monarch, elated by victory, again threatened the peace of Asia, and the presence of the emperor was indispensably required, both in the West and in the East. For the first time, Constantius sincerely acknowledged, that his single strength was unequal to such an extent of care and of dominion.¹ Insensible to the voice of flattery, which assured him that his all-powerful virtue, and celestial fortune, would still continue to triumph over every obstacle, he listened with complacency to the advice of Eusebia, which gratified his indulgence, without offending his suspicious pride. As she perceived that the remembrance of Gallus dwelt on the emperor's mind, she artfully turned his attention to the opposite characters of the two brothers, which from their infancy had been compared to those of Domitian and of Titus.² She accustomed her husband to con-

¹ Recessit enim, sed necesse erat, ut imperator stabili esset, ut in quodam loco, quodam fuerit, apertis demonstraret. Aurelian. l. vi. c. 8. He then expresses, in his own words, the fatiguing multiplicity of the business.

² Tantum a propensitate matris Juliane diffusus fuerit quantum longe Vespasiani illius filii, Domitiani et Titus. Aurelian. l. xiv. c. 11. The circumstances and education of the two brothers were exactly the same, as to afford a strong mark, so of the opposite difference of character.

CHAP.
XIX.

sider Julian as a youth of a mild unambitious disposition, whose allegiance and gratitude might be secured by the gift of the purple, and who was qualified to fill, with honour, a subordinate station, without aspiring to dispute the commands, or to shade the glories, of his sovereign and benefactor. After an obstinate, though secret struggle, the opposition of the favourite eunuchs submitted to the ascendancy of the empress; and it was resolved that Julian, after celebrating his nuptials with Helena, sister of Constantine, should be appointed, with the title of Cæsar, to reign over the countries beyond the Alps.¹

Although the order which recalled him to court was probably accompanied by some intimation of his approaching greatness, he appeals to the people of Athens to witness his tears of undissimulated sorrow, when he was reluctantly torn away from his beloved retirement.² He trembled for his life, for his fame, and even for his virtue; and his sole confidence was derived from the persuasion, that Minerva inspired all his actions, and that he was protected by an invisible guard of angels, whom for that purpose she had borrowed from the sun and moon. He approached with horror the palace of Milan; nor could the ingenuous youth conceal his indignation, when he found himself accosted with false and servile respect by the assassins of his family. Eusebius, re-

¹ Historia ecclesiastica, l. vii. c. 36. Recessus, l. iii. p. 123, 128.

² Julian, ed. A. A. & A. p. 714, 716. Letters, 102, 2. p. 248.

Julian did not yield till the gods had signified their will by repeated prodigia and omens. But poets must describe him so to do.

joining in the success of her benevolent schemes, embraced him with the tenderness of a sister; and endeavoured, by the most soothing caresses, to dispel his terrors, and reconcile him to his fortune. But the ceremony of shaving his beard, and his awkward demeanour, when he first exchanged the cloak of a Greek philosopher for the military habit of a Roman prince, amused, during a few days, the levity of the imperial court.*

The emperors of the age of Constantine no longer designed to consult with the senate in the choice of a colleague; but they were anxious that their nomination should be ratified by the consent of the army. On this solemn occasion, the guards, with the other troops whose stations were in the neighbourhood of Milan, appeared under arms; and Constantine ascended his lofty tribunal, holding by the hand his cousin Julian, who entered the same day into the twenty-fifth year of his age.[†] In a studied speech, conceived and delivered with dignity, the emperor represented the various dangers which threatened the prosperity of the republic, the necessity of naming a Cæsar for the administration of the West, and his own intention, if it was agreeable to their wishes, of rewarding with the honours of the purple the promising virtues of the nephew of Constantine. The approbation of the soldiers was

* Julian himself relates in 224, with some humour, the tenderness of his own mother-in-law, his daughter-in-law, and his playmates being then suddenly transported into a more hostile, more every almost opposed stance and hostile.

† See Antonin. Marcellin. l. vii. c. 4. Epiphani. l. iii. p. 128. Alexand. Vict. Vener. Basilid. in Epistol. Epiph. c. 16.

CHAP.
XIX.
.....

testified by a respectful murmur: they gazed on the manly countenance of Julian, and observed with pleasure, that the fire which sparkled in his eyes was tempered by a modest blush, on being thus exposed, for the first time, to the public view of mankind. As soon as the ceremony of his investiture had been performed, Constantius addressed him with the tone of authority which his superior age and station permitted him to assume, and exhorting the new Cæsar to deserve, by heroic deeds, that sacred and immortal name, the emperor gave his colleague the strongest assurances of a friendship which should never be impaired by time, nor interrupted by their separation into the most distant climates. As soon as the speech was ended, the troops, as a token of applause, clashed their shields against their knees;* while the officers who surrounded the tribunal expressed, with decent reserve, their sense of the merits of the representative of Constantine.

and declares
of Cæsar;
a. m. 334.
Nov. 6.

The two princes returned to the palace in the same chariot: and during the slow procession, Julian repeated to himself a verse of his favourite Homer, which he might equally apply to his fortune and to his fears.^b The four-and-twenty

* Militum omnia ferreæ fragore rotæ gemitus cluere: quæ et præpetitis iactantur phœnix, hæc nostra est hæc styp-tychæ, hic sternuntur, hic et Julia. Annuntio vobis, sunt a me discuntur, Romæ ut pœnet revocantur, serventur, et vobis omnia iudicantur, nec infra quæ deditur.

^b Julianus æquanimiter, hæc est, hæc est, hæc est, hæc est. The word perplex, which Homer had used, as a vague, but common epithet for death, was applied by Julian to express, with aptly, the agony and object of his own apprehensions.

days which the Cæsar spent at Milan after his investiture, and the first months of his Gallic reign, were devoted to a splendid, but severe captivity; nor could the acquisition of honour compensate for the loss of freedom.* His steps were watched, his correspondence was intercepted; and he was obliged, by prudence, to decline the visits of his most intimate friends. Of his former domestics, four only were permitted to attend him; two pages, his physician, and his librarian; the last of whom was employed in the care of a valuable collection of books, the gift of the empress, who studied the inclinations as well as the interest of her friend. In the room of these faithful servants, an household was formed, such indeed as became the dignity of a Cæsar; but it was filled with a crowd of slaves, destitute, and perhaps incapable, of any attachment for their new master, to whom, for the most part, they were either unknown or suspected. His want of experience might require the assistance of a wise counsel; but the minute instructions which regulated the service of his table, and the distribution of his hours, were adapted to a youth still under the discipline of his preceptors, rather than to the situation of a prince entrusted with the conduct of an im-

* His arguments, in the next paragraph (see. 115) the duration of his new situation. The permission to his table was however so adapted and proportioned, that the young philosopher rejected it with disdain. Quæsi hæc præcepta nonnulli quædam Constantini ut intelligamus ad istam partem suam ad consuetudinem prædictam dispositam, quæ in cæsaribus imperatoribus debent, Placuit, ut talibus et ceteris talibus et ceteris. Antonian. Marcellin. l. xli. c. 1.

civil and military officers, held in the presence of the emperor himself, the innocence of Sylvanus was publicly acknowledged. But the discovery came too late; the report of the calumny and the hasty seizure of his estate had already provoked the indignant chief to the rebellion of which he was so unjustly accused. He assumed the purple at his head-quarters of Cologne, and his active powers appeared to menace Italy with an invasion, and Milan with a siege. In this emergency, Ursicinus, a general of equal rank, regained, by an act of treachery, the favour which he had lost by his eminent services in the East. Exasperated, as he might speciously allege, by injuries of a similar nature, he hastened with a few followers to join the standard, and to betray the confidence, of his too credulous friend. After a reign of only twenty-eight days, Sylvanus was assassinated: the soldiers who, without any criminal intention, had blindly followed the example of their leader, immediately returned to their allegiance; and the flatterers of Constantine celebrated the wisdom and felicity of the monarch who had extinguished a civil war without the hazard of a battle.¹

The protection of the Rhætian frontier, and the persecution of the Catholic church, detained Constantine in Italy above eighteen months after the departure of Julian. Before the emperor returned into the East, he indulged his pride and then resided in Rome,

Constantine
A. D. 327,
April 28.

¹ Ammianus, lvi. It was perfectly well informed of the conduct and fate of Sylvanus: the emperor was one of the few soldiers who were able to discern in his dangerous enterprise.

CHAP. ^{XX.} curiosity in a visit to the ancient capital.* He proceeded from Milan to Rome along the Æmilian and Flaminian ways; and as soon as he approached within forty miles of the city, the march of a prince who had never vanquished a foreign enemy, assumed the appearance of a triumphal procession. His splendid train was composed of all the ministers of luxury; but in a time of profound peace, he was encompassed by the glittering arms of the numerous squadrons of his guards and cuirassiers. Their streaming banners of silk, embossed with gold, and shaped in the form of dragons, waved round the person of the emperor. Constantine sat alone in a lofty car resplendent with gold and precious gems; and, except when he bowed his head to pass under the gates of the city, he affected a stately demeanour of inflexible, and, as it might seem, of insensible gravity. The severe discipline of the Persian youth had been introduced by the eunuchs into the imperial palace; and such were the habits of patience which they had inculcated, that during a slow and sultry march, he was never seen to move his hand towards his face, or to turn his eyes either to the right or to the left. He was received by the magistrates and senate of Rome; and the emperor surveyed, with attention, the civil honours of the republic, and the consular images of the noble families. The streets were lined with an innumerable multitude. Their repeated acclamations expressed their joy at beholding, after an absence of thirty-two years, the sacred person of their sovereign; and Constantius himself expressed, with some pleasant, his affected surprise that the human race should thus suddenly be collected on the same spot. The son of Constantine was lodged in the ancient palace of Augustus; he presided in the senate, harangued the people from the tribunal which Cicero had so often ascended, assisted with nominal courtesy at the games of the circus, and accepted the crowns of gold, as well as the panegyrics which had been prepared for the ceremony by the deputies of the principal cities. His short visit of thirty days was employed in viewing the monuments of art and power, which were scattered over the seven hills and the interjacent valleys. He admired the awful majesty of the capitol, the vast extent of the baths of Caracalla and Diocletian, the severe simplicity of the pantheon, the massy greatness of the amphitheatre of Titus, the elegant architecture of the theatre of Pompey and the temple of peace, and, above all, the stately structure of the forum and column of Trajan; acknowledging that the voice of fame, so prone to invent and to magnify, had made an inadequate report of the metropolis of the world. The traveller, who has contemplated the ruins of ancient Rome, may conceive some imperfect idea of the sentiments which they must have inspired when they reared their heads in the splendour of unsullied beauty.

* For the particulars of the visit of Constantine to Rome, see Ammianus, l. xxi. c. 13. We have only to add, that Theodoret was repeatedly deposed from Constantinople, and that he completed his fourth nation in this country.

CHAP.
XIX.

A NEW OBELISK.

The satisfaction which Constantius had received from this journey excited him to the generous emulation of bestowing on the Romans some memorial of his own gratitude and munificence. His first idea was to imitate the equestrian and colossal statue which he had seen in the forum of Trajan; but when he had maturely weighed the difficulties of the execution,* he chose rather to embellish the capital by the gift of an Egyptian obelisk. In a remote but polished age, which seems to have preceded the invention of alphabetical writing, a great number of these obelisks had been erected, in the cities of Thebes and Heliopolis, by the ancient sovereigns of Egypt, in a just confidence that the simplicity of their form, and the hardness of their substance, would resist the injuries of time and violence.† Several of these extraordinary columns had been transported to Rome by Augustus and his successors, as the most durable monuments of their power and victory;‡ but there remained one obelisk, Baselensis, a legatus provincie Pannie, statuit ut theopropos, that it be made with a horse, he must think of preparing a stable for stable the forms of Thebes. Another saying of Hieronymus is recorded: "that one thing only had displaced him, so that this one kind of feline is well at Thebes." If we adopt this reading of the list of Antiquities (Egyptian) instead of placidus, we may consider it as a record of Roman empire. The contrary sense would be that of a misanthrope.

* When Germanicus visited the ancient monuments of Thebes, the effect of the pyramids explained to him the meaning of these hieroglyphics. Tacit. Annal. II. c. 14. But it seems probable, that before the usual meaning of an obelisk, there existed an additional sense, when the constant character of the Egyptian nation. See Macrobius Saturn. I. lib. 1. c. 14. p. 25. 26.

† See Plin. Hist. Natur. I. lib. 36. c. 14. 15.

CHAP.

XIX.

which, from its size or sanctity, escaped for a long time the rapacious vanity of the conquerors. It was designed by Constantine to adorn his new city;² and, after being removed by his order from the pedestal where it stood before the temple of the Sun at Heliopolis, was floated down the Nile to Alexandria. The death of Constantine suspended the execution of his purpose, and this obelisk was destined by his son to the ancient capital of the empire. A vessel of uncommon strength and capacity was provided to convey this enormous weight of granite, at least an hundred and fifteen feet in length, from the banks of the Nile to those of the Tyber. The obelisk of Constantine was landed about three miles from the city, and erected, by the efforts of art and labour, in the great circus of Rome.³

The departure of Constantine from Rome was hastened by the alarming intelligence of the distress and danger of the Illyrian provinces. The distractions of civil war, and the irreparable loss which the Roman legions had sustained in the battle of Mursa, exposed those countries, almost without defence, to the light cavalry of

The Question and Answer
1. p. 311,
218, 220

² Ancient History, 6. 226, c. 6. He gives us a short interpretation of the hieroglyphics, and his explanation of the obelisk is a little imperfect. Also, in every series of the age of Constantine, we have a short history of the obelisk.

³ See Revue, Rome Antique, 2. 24, c. 14, p. 11, and the Journal, though confused. Dissertation of Burigny on Obelisks, inserted in the fourth volume of Comptes Rendus, 1784, p. 107-116. This dissertation is dedicated to Pope Sixtus V. who moved the obelisk of Constantine to the square before the patriarchal church of St. John Lateran.

CHAP. the barbarians; and particularly to the inroads XIX. of the Quadi, a fierce and powerful nation, who seem to have exchanged the institutions of Germany for the arms and military arts of their Ser-mation allies.* The garrisons of the frontier were insufficient to check their progress; and the indolent monarch was at length compelled to assemble, from the extremities of his dominions, the flower of the Palatine troops, to take the field in person, and to employ a whole campaign, with the preceding autumn and the ensuing spring, in the serious prosecution of the war.
 The emperor passed the Danube on a bridge of boats, cut in pieces all that encountered his march, penetrated into the heart of the country of the Quadi, and severely retaliated the calamities which they had inflicted on the Roman province. The dismayed barbarians were soon reduced to sue for peace; they offered the restitution of his captive subjects, as an atonement for the past, and the noblest hostages as a pledge of their future conduct. The generous courtesy which was shewn to the first among their chieftains who implored the clemency of Constantius, encouraged the more timid, or the more obstinate, to imitate their example; and the imperial camp was crowded with the princes and ambassadors of the most distant tribes, who occupied the plains of the Lesser Poland, and who might have deemed themselves secure behind the lofty ridge of the Carpathian mountains. While Constantius gave

* The extent of this Quadian and Sarmatian warfare is stated by Ammianus, xiv. 16; xv. 12, 13, 14; 11.

laws to the barbarians beyond the Danube, he distinguished with specious compassion the Sarmatian exiles, who had been expelled from their native country by the rebellion of their slaves, and who formed a very considerable accession to the power of the Quadi. The emperor, embracing a generous but artful system of policy, released the Sarmatians from the bands of this humiliating dependence, and restored them, by a separate treaty, to the dignity of a nation united under the government of a king, the friend and ally of the republic. He declared his resolution of asserting the justice of their cause, and of securing the peace of the provinces by the extirpation, or at least the banishment, of the Limigantes, whose manners were still infected with the vices of their servile origin. The execution of this design was attended with more difficulty than glory. The territory of the Limigantes was protected against the Romans by the Danube, against the hostile barbarians by the Teyss. The marshy lands, which lay between those rivers, and were often covered by their inundations, formed an intricate wilderness, pervious only to the inhabitants, who were acquainted with its secret paths and inaccessible fortresses. On the approach of Constantius, the Limigantes tried the efficacy of prayers, of fraud, and of arms; but he sternly rejected their supplications, defeated their rude stratagems, and repelled with skill and firmness the efforts of their irregular valour. One of their most warlike tribes, established in a small island towards the conflux of the Teyss and the

CHAP.
XIX.

Danube, consented to pass the river with the intention of surprising the emperor during the security of an amicable conference. They soon became the victims of the perfidy which they meditated. Encompassed on every side, trampled down by the cavalry, slaughtered by the swords of the legions, they disdained to ask for mercy; and with an undaunted countenance still grasped their weapons in the agonies of death. After this victory a considerable body of Romans was landed on the opposite banks of the Danube; the Taisfale, a Gothic tribe engaged in the service of the empire, invaded the Limigantes on the side of the Teyas; and their former masters, the free Sarmatians, animated by hope and revenge, penetrated through the hilly country into the heart of their ancient possessions. A general conflagration revealed the huts of the barbarians, which were seated in the depth of the wilderness; and the soldier fought with confidence on marshy ground, which it was dangerous for him to tread. In this extremity, the bravest of the Limigantes were resolved to die in arms, rather than to yield; but the milder sentiment, enforced by the authority of their elders, at length prevailed, and the suppliant crowd, followed by their wives and children, repaired to the imperial camp, to learn their fate from the mouth of the conqueror. After celebrating his own clemency, which was still inclined to pardon their repeated crimes, and to spare the remnant of a guilty nation, Constantius assigned for the place of their exile, a remote country, where they might enjoy a safe and honourable repose. The Limigantes obeyed with reluctance; but before they could reach, at least ^{C. H. & F.} before they could occupy, their destined habitations, they returned to the banks of the Danube, exaggerating the hardships of their situation, and requesting, with fervent professions of fidelity, that the emperor would grant them an undisturbed settlement within the limits of the Roman provinces. Instead of consulting his own experience of their incurable perfidy, Constantine listened to his flatterers, who were ready to represent the honour and advantage of accepting a colony of soldiers, at a time when it was much easier to obtain the pecuniary contributions, than the military service of the subjects of the empire. The Limigantes were permitted to pass the Danube; and the emperor gave audience to the multitude in a large plain near the modern city of Buda. They surrounded the tribunal, and seemed to hear with respect an oration full of mildness and dignity; when one of the barbarians, casting his shoe into the air, exclaimed with a loud voice, Marha! Marha! a word of defiance, which was received as the signal of the tumult. They rushed with fury to seize the person of the emperor; his royal throne and golden couch were pillaged by these rude hands; but the faithful defence of his guards, who died at his feet, allowed him a moment to mount a fleet horse, and to escape from the confusion. The disgrace which had been incurred by a treacherous surprise, was soon retrieved by the numbers and discipline of the Romans, and the combat was only terminated by the extinction of the name and nation of the Lunigantes. The free Sarmatians were reinstated in the possession of their ancient seats; and although Constantius distrusted the levity of their character, he entertained some hopes that a sense of gratitude might influence their future conduct. He had remarked the lofty stature and obsequious demeanour of Zizais, one of the noblest of their chiefs. He conferred on him the title of king; and Zizais proved that he was not unworthy to reign, by a sincere and lasting attachment to the interest of his benefactor, who, after this splendid success, received the name of Sarmaticus from the acclamations of his victorious army.*

CHAP.
XIX.

The Persian negotiation,
A. D. 338.

While the Roman emperor and the Persian monarch, at the distance of three thousand miles, defended their extreme limits against the barbarians of the Danube and of the Oxus, their intermediate frontier experienced the vicissitudes of a languid war, and a precarious truce. Two of the eastern ministers of Constantius, the prætorian præfect Musonius, whose abilities were disgraced by the want of truth and integrity, and Cassian duke of Mesopotamia, a hardy and veteran soldier, opened a secret negotiation with the satrap Tamapor.† These overtures of peace, translated into the servile and flattering language of Asia, were transmitted to the camp of the great king; who resolved to signify, by an am-

* Genli Sarmatarum magno decore militibus apud eos regem dedit. Atilius Vapian. In a pompous style presented by Constantine himself, he expatiates on his own exploits with much vanity, and some truth.

† Amianus, xvi. 8.

ambassador, the terms which he was inclined to grant to the suppliant Romans. Narpes, whom he invested with that character, was honourably received in his passage through Antioch and Constantinople; he reached Sirmium after a long journey, and, at his first audience, respectfully unfolded the silken veil which covered the haughty epistle of his sovereign. Sapor, king of kings, and brother of the Sun and Moon (such were the lofty titles affected by oriental vanity), expressed his satisfaction that his brother, Constantine Caesar, had been taught wisdom by adversity. As the lawful successor of Darius Hystaspes, Sapor asserted, that the river Strymon in Macedonia was the true and ancient boundary of his empire; declaring, however, that as an evidence of his moderation, he would content himself with the provinces of Armenia and Mesopotamia, which had been fraudulently extorted from his ancestors. He alleged, that, without the restitution of these disputed countries, it was impossible to establish any treaty on a solid and permanent basis; and he arrogantly threatened, that if his ambassador returned in vain, he was prepared to take the field in the spring, and to support the justice of his cause by the strength of his invincible arms. Narpes, who was endowed with the most polite and amiable manners, endeavoured, as far as was consistent with his duty, to soften the harshness of the message.⁸ Both the style

⁸ Ammianus refers, by way of illustration, the haughty letter. Theodoret (Hist. iv, p. 22, edit. Paris.) takes notice of the silken veil.

CHAP.
XIX

and substance were maturely weighed in the imperial council, and he was dismissed with the following answer: "Constantius had a right to disclaim the officiousness of his ministers, who had acted without any specific orders from the throne; he was not, however, averse to an equal and honourable treaty; but it was highly indecent, as well as absurd, to propose to the sole and victorious emperor of the Roman world, the same conditions of peace which he had indignantly rejected at the time when his power was contracted within the narrow limits of the East: the chance of arms was uncertain; and Sapor should recollect, that if the Romans had sometimes been vanquished in battle, they had almost always been successful in the event of the war." A few days after the departure of Narses, three ambassadors were sent to the court of Sapor, who was already returned from the Scythian expedition to his ordinary residence of Ctesiphon. A count, a notary, and a sophist, had been selected for this important commission; and Constantius, who was secretly anxious for the conclusion of the peace, entertained some hopes that the dignity of the first of these ministers, the dexterity of the second, and the rhetoric of the third,* would persuade the Persian monarch

Sup. Idem. and Constantine mention the journey of the ambassadors, and Peter the Patriarch (in Kamper's Leipzig p. 289) has informed us in his concluding observations.

* Ammonius, Art. 4, and Valentinus ad luc. The sophist, or poet, Ammonius (the poet) Ammonius, who, Ammonius, Ammonius, was Ammonius the Cappadocian, the disciple of Ammonius, and the friend of St. Basil. Ammonius de Vit. Aetern. p. 44-45) Ammonius Ammonius.

to state of the rigour of his demands. But the progress of their negotiation was opposed and defeated by the hostile arts of Antoninus,* a Roman subject of Syria, who had fled from oppression, and was admitted into the councils of Sapor, and even to the royal table, where, according to the custom of the Persians, the most important business was frequently discussed. The detestable fugitive promoted his interest by the same conduct which gratified his revenge. He incessantly urged the ambition of his new master, to embrace the favourable opportunity when the bravest of the Palatine troops were employed with the emperor in a distant war on the Danube. He pressed Sapor to invade the exhausted and defenceless provinces of the East, with the numerous armies of Persia, now fortified by the valour and accession of the fiercest barbarians. The ambassadors of Rome retired without success, and a second embassy of a still more honourable rank, was detained in strict confinement, and threatened either with death or exile.

although in this paragraph Antoninus has glory in withdrawing the participation by the Persian charges of treachery and disloyalty. — Tacitus, Hist. des Empereurs, liv. vi. p. 419-422.

* Antonin. l. c. 4, 5. The desert and desperate behaviour of Antoninus towards the Roman general who Sapor is a very interesting sight, and Antoninus himself speaks of the matter with some satisfaction and reserve.

* This representation, as it is related by Antoninus, seems to prove the reality of Hypsicles's &c. &c. 1236, and the permanency of the Persian soldiers. In brief, the Persians have been able to take the initiative, and the signs of their have triumphed over the loss of Mesopotamia. — Revue de l'Empire, 1. 11, p. 402-412, and Chronique, Revue de l'Empire, 1. 11, p. 40.

CHAP.

XIX.

Intention of Mesopotamia by Sapor,
A. D. 239.

The military historian,¹ who was himself dispatched to observe the army of the Persians, as they were preparing to construct a bridge of boats over the Tigris, beheld from an eminence the plain of Assyria, as far as the edge of the horizon, covered with men, with horses, and with arms. Sapor appeared in the front, conspicuous by the splendour of his purple. On his left hand, the place of honour among the orientals, Grumbates, king of the Chlonites, displayed the stern countenance of an aged and renowned warrior. The monarch had reserved a similar place on his right hand for the king of the Albanians, who led his independent tribes from the shores of the Caspian. The satraps and generals were distributed according to their several ranks, and the whole army, besides the numerous train of oriental luxury, consisted of more than one hundred thousand effective men, inured to fatigue, and selected from the bravest nations of Asia. The Roman deserter, who in some measure guided the councils of Sapor, had prudently advised, that instead of wasting the summer in tedious and difficult sieges, he should march directly to the Euphrates, and press forwards without delay to seize the fertile and wealthy metropolis of Syria. But the Persians were no sooner advanced into the plains of Mesopotamia, than they discovered that every precaution had been used which could retard their progress, or defeat their design. The inhabitants, with their cattle, were secured in places of strength, the green forage throughout the country was set on fire, the fords of the river were fortified by sharp stakes, military engines were planted on the opposite banks, and a reasonable swell of the waters of the Euphrates deterred the barbarians from attempting the ordinary passage of the bridge of Thapsacus. Their skilful guide, changing his plan of operations, then conducted the army by a longer circuit, but through a fertile territory, towards the head of the Euphrates, where the infant river is reduced to a shallow and inaccessible stream. Sapor overlooked, with prudent disdain, the strength of Nisibis; but as he passed under the walls of Amida, he resolved to try whether the majesty of his presence would not awe the garrison into immediate submission. The sacrilegious insult of a random dart, which glanced against the royal tiara, convinced him of his error; and the indignant monarch listened with impatience to the advice of his ministers, who conjured him not to sacrifice the success of his ambition to the gratification of his resentment. The following day Grumbates advanced towards the gates with a select body of troops, and required the instant surrender of the city, as the only atonement which could be accepted for such an act of rashness and insolence. His proposals were answered by a general discharge, and his only son, a beautiful and valiant youth, was pierced through the heart by a javelin, shot from one of the balistæ. The funeral of the prince of the Chionites was celebrated according to the rites of his country; and the

¹ Ammian. l. xvii. 4, 7, 8, 10.

CHAP.
SIX.

grief to his aged father was alleviated by the solemn promise of Sapor, that the guilty city of Amida should serve as a funeral pile to expiate the death, and to perpetuate the memory, of his son.

5. Staphylococcus aureus

The ancient city of Amid or Arbada,* which sometimes assumes the provincial appellation of Diarbekie,² is advantageously situate in a fertile plain, entered by the natural and artificial channels of the Tigris, of which the best inconsiderable stream heads in a semicircular form round the eastern part of the city. The emperor Constantius had recently conferred on Arbada the honours of his own name, and the additional fortifications of strong walls and lofty towers. It was provided with an arsenal of military engines, and the ordinary garrison had been reinforced to the amount of seven legions, when the place was invested by the arms of Sapor.³ His first and most sanguine hopes depended on the success of a general

See also the description of Antioch in Itinerarium Hierosolymitanum, p. 108. Hildner, Die Troaden, pp. 100-101, 103, 104, 105, 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121, 122, 123, 124, 125, 126, 127, 128, 129, 130, 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137, 138, 139, 140, 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162, 163, 164, 165, 166, 167, 168, 169, 170, 171, 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182, 183, 184, 185, 186, 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192, 193, 194, 195, 196, 197, 198, 199, 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235, 236, 237, 238, 239, 240, 241, 242, 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249, 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255, 256, 257, 258, 259, 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265, 266, 267, 268, 269, 270, 271, 272, 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278, 279, 280, 281, 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298, 299, 300, 301, 302, 303, 304, 305, 306, 307, 308, 309, 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315, 316, 317, 318, 319, 320, 321, 322, 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329, 330, 331, 332, 333, 334, 335, 336, 337, 338, 339, 340, 341, 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347, 348, 349, 350, 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356, 357, 358, 359, 360, 361, 362, 363, 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369, 370, 371, 372, 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378, 379, 380, 381, 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 404, 405, 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421, 422, 423, 424, 425, 426, 427, 428, 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444, 445, 446, 447, 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453, 454, 455, 456, 457, 458, 459, 460, 461, 462, 463, 464, 465, 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471, 472, 473, 474, 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495, 496, 497, 498, 499, 500, 501, 502, 503, 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510, 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537, 538, 539, 540, 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546, 547, 548, 549, 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555, 556, 557, 558, 559, 560, 561, 562, 563, 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662, 663, 664, 665, 666, 667, 668, 669, 670, 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702, 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713, 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730, 731, 732, 733, 734, 735, 736, 737, 738, 739, 740, 741, 742, 743, 744, 745, 746, 747, 748, 749, 750, 751, 752, 753, 754, 755, 756, 757, 758, 759, 760, 761, 762, 763, 764, 765, 766, 767, 768, 769, 770, 771, 772, 773, 774, 775, 776, 777, 778, 779, 780, 781, 782, 783, 784, 785, 786, 787, 788, 789, 790, 791, 792, 793, 794, 795, 796, 797, 798, 799, 800, 801, 802, 803, 804, 805, 806, 807, 808, 809, 810, 811, 812, 813, 814, 815, 816, 817, 818, 819, 820, 821, 822, 823, 824, 825, 826, 827, 828, 829, 830, 831, 832, 833, 834, 835, 836, 837, 838, 839, 840, 841, 842, 843, 844, 845, 846, 847, 848, 849, 850, 851, 852, 853, 854, 855, 856, 857, 858, 859, 860, 861, 862, 863, 864, 865, 866, 867, 868, 869, 870, 871, 872, 873, 874, 875, 876, 877, 878, 879, 880, 881, 882, 883, 884, 885, 886, 887, 888, 889, 890, 891, 892, 893, 894, 895, 896, 897, 898, 899, 900, 901, 902, 903, 904, 905, 906, 907, 908, 909, 91

* Blacus, which is varied about, on Chalcid, or the post-wings of the Pieris, reaching about 10,000 inches, and is the medium of a paper with short hairs. The spines of Kane is derived from the Chalcid of the same which imparts the strong and soft scent of Amor.

The specimens of the large mammals are very poorly described by ANNALS, (vol. 1, 2) who went on to say that part is the skeleton, and wrapped with difficulty when the day was stopped by the Famine.

assault. To the several nations which followed CHAP.
XXX
his standard their respective posts were assigned: the south to the Vertæ, the north to the Almannians, the east to the Chionites, inflamed with grief and indignation; the west to the Segestans, the bravest of his warriors, who covered their front with a formidable line of Indian elephants.* The Persians, on every side, supported their efforts, and animated their courage: and the monarch himself, careless of his rank and safety, displayed, in the prosecution of the siege, the ardour of a youthful soldier. After an obstinate combat, the barbarians were repulsed; they incessantly returned to the charge: they were again driven back with a dreadful slaughter, and two rebel legions of Gauls, who had been banished into the East, signalized their undisciplined courage by a nocturnal sally into the heart of the Persian camp. In one of the fiercest of these repeated assaults, Amida was betrayed by the treachery of a deserter, who indicated to the barbarians a secret and neglected staircase, scrooped out of the rock that hangs over the stream of the Tigris. Seventy chosen archers of the royal guard ascended in silence to the third story of a lofty tower which

* Of these four nations, the Almannians are too well known to require any description. The Segestans inhabited a large and level country, which still preserves their name, to the south of Khemist, and the west of Hissarum (see Geographie Nomencl. p. 512, and d'Histoire, Bibliographie Osmoise, p. 1514). Notwithstanding the boasted victory of Schems, (vol. 6, p. 410) the Segestans, about fourteen years afterwards, appear as an independent nation, the ally of Persia. We are ignorant of the situation of the Vertæ and Chionites, but I am inclined to place them (at least the latter) towards the borders of India and Abyssinia. See Amidon, vol. 8.

CHAP.
XIX.

commanded the precipice : they elevated on high the Persian banner, the signal of confidence to the assailants, and of dismay to the besieged ; and if this devoted band could have maintained their post a few minutes longer, the reduction of the place might have been purchased by the sacrifice of their lives. After Sapor had tried, without success, the efficacy of force and of stratagem, he had recourse to the slower but more certain operations of a regular siege, in the conduct of which he was instructed by the skill of the Roman deserters. The trenches were opened at a convenient distance, and the troops destined for that service advanced, under the portable cover of strong hurdles, to fill up the ditch, and undermine the foundations of the walls. Wooden towers were at the same time constructed, and moved forward on wheels, till the soldiers, who were provided with every species of missile weapons, could engage almost on level ground with the troops who defended the rampart. Every mode of resistance which art could suggest, or courage could execute, was employed in the defence of Amida, and the works of Sapor were more than once destroyed by the fire of the Romans. But the resources of a besieged city may be exhausted. The Persians repaired their losses, and pushed their approaches ; a large breach was made by the battering ram, and the strength of the garrison, wasted by the sword and by disease, yielded to the fury of the assault. The soldiers, the citizens, their wives, their children, all who had not time to escape through the opposite gate were involved by the conquerors in a promiscuous massacre.

CHAP.
XIX.

But the ruin of Amida was the safety of the Roman provinces. As soon as the first transports of victory had subsided, Sapor was at leisure to reflect, that to chastise a disobedient city, he had lost the flower of his troops, and the most favourable season for conquest.¹ Thirty thousand of his veterans had fallen under the walls of Amida, during the continuance of a siege which lasted seventy-three days; and the disappointed monarch returned to his capital with affected triumph and secret mortification. It was more than probable, that the inconstancy of his barbarian allies was tempted to relinquish a war in which they had encountered such unexpected difficulties; and that the aged king of the Chosroites, satiated with revenge, turned away with horror from a scene of action where he had been deprived of the hope of his family and nation. The strength as well as

OF THE PART. II.
A. D. 360.

¹ Ammianus has marked the chronology of this year by three signs, which do not perfectly coincide with each other, as with the series of the history. 1. The year was ripe when Sapor besieged Mesopotamia: "Cum jam optima sæviret æquinox;" a considerable season, which, in the latitude of Aleppo, would naturally refer us to the month of April or May. See Warner's Observations on Mesopotamia, vol. 1, p. 51. Shaw's Travels, p. 232, note 4th. 2. The progress of Sapor was checked by the overflowing of the Euphrates, which generally happens in July and August. Hist. Hist. Nat. 1, 21. Voyage en Poissin della Valley, tom. 1, p. 498. 3. When Sapor had raised Amida, after a siege of seventy-three days, the nations were by advanced. "Autumno præcipiti barbaricæ impetu." "ubi cetera." To reconcile these apparent contradictions, we must allow for some delay in the Persian king, some temporary in the situation, and some quarter in the season.

CHAP. spirit of the army with which Sapor took the field
XIX. in the ensuing spring, was no longer equal to the unbounded views of his ambition. Instead of aspiring to the conquest of the East, he was obliged to content himself with the reduction of two fortified cities of Mesopotamia, Singara and Bezabde;* the one situate in the midst of a sandy desert, the other in a small peninsula, surrounded almost on every side by the deep and rapid stream of the Tigris. Five Roman legions, of the diminutive size to which they had been reduced in the age of Constantine, were made prisoners, and sent into remote captivity on the extreme confines of Persia. After dismantling the walls of Singara, the conqueror abandoned that solitary and sequestered place; but he carefully restored the fortifications of Bezabde, and fixed in that important post a garrison or colony of veterans, amply supplied with every means of defence, and animated by high sentiments of honour and fidelity. Towards the close of the campaign, the arms of Sapor incurred some disgrace by an unsuccessful enterprise against Viritha, or Teerit, a strong, or as it was universally esteemed till the age of Famerlane, an invulnerable fortress of the independent Arabs.†

* The account of these sieges is given by Ammianus, l. xi, c. i.

† For the identity of Viritha and Teerit, see d'Anville, Géographie Ancienne, tom. iv. p. 202. For the siege of that castle by Timur Bar, or Tamerlane, see Chevalardin, l. iii, c. 22. The Persian historians exaggerate the merit and difficulty of this exploit, which delivered the empire of Bagdad from a formidable gang of robbers.

The defence of the East against the arms of Sapor, required, and would have exercised, the abilities of the most consummate general; and it seemed fortunate for the state, that it was the actual province of the brave Ursicinus, who alone deserved the confidence of the soldiers and people. In the hour of danger, Ursicinus* was removed from his station by the intrigues of the eunuchs; and the military command of the East was bestowed, by the same influence, on Sabinian, a wealthy and subtle veteran, who had attained the infirmities, without acquiring the experience, of age. By a second order, which issued from the same jealous and inconstant counsels, Ursicinus was again dispatched to the frontier of Mesopotamia, and condemned to sustain the labours of a war, the honours of which had been transferred to his unworthy rival. Sabinian fixed his indolent station under the walls of Edessa; and while he amused himself with the idle parade of military exercise, and moved to the sound of flutes in the Pyrrhic dance, the public defence was abandoned to the boldness and diligence of the former general of the East. But whenever Ursicinus recommended any vigorous plan of operations; when he proposed, at the head of a light and active army, to wheel round the foot of the mountains, to intercept the convoys of the enemy, to harass the wide extent of the Persian lines, and to re-

* Ammianus (lib. 2, c. 4; v. 3, c. 2) represents the merit and disguise of Ursicinus with that falling attention which a soldier owes to his general. Some partiality may be suspected, yet the whole account is consistent and probable.

CHAP. lieve the distress of Amida; the timid and en-SIX.vious commander alleged, that he was restrained by his positive orders from endangering the safety of the troops. Amida was at length taken; its bravest defenders, who had escaped the sword of the barbarians, died in the Roman camp by the hand of the executioner; and Ursinius himself, after supporting the disgrace of a partial inquiry, was punished for the misconduct of Sabianus by the loss of his military rank. But Constantine soon experienced the truth of the prediction which honest indignation had extorted from his injured lieutenant, that as long as such maxims of government were suffered to prevail, the emperor himself would find it no easy task to defend his eastern dominions from the invasion of a foreign enemy. When he had subdued or pacified the barbarians of the Danube, Constantine proceeded by slow marches into the East; and after he had wept over the smoking ruins of Amida, he formed, with a powerful army, the siege of Bezabde. The walls were shaken by the reiterated efforts of the most enormous of the battering-rams; the town was reduced to the last extremity; but it was still defended by the patient and intrepid valour of the garrison, till the approach of the rainy season obliged the emperor to raise the siege, and ingloriously to retreat into his winter-quarters at Antioch.* The pride of Constantine, and the in-

* Ammian. ix. 11. Abdus vero impio, fortissime Acetabie castro in Syria ardentem, perperam et ab urbe sed ptatrem, diuque defendit. It is also that James Greaves has noticed an obscure passage; and he thinks that this corruption alone would have destroyed

geniety of his courtiers, were at a loss to discover any materials for panegyric in the events of the Persian wars; while the glory of his cousin Julian, to whose military command he had entrusted the provinces of Gaul, was proclaimed to the world in the simple and concise narrative of his exploits.

In the blind fury of civil discord, Constantine had abandoned to the barbarians of Germany the countries of Gaul, which still acknowledged the authority of his rival. A numerous swarm of Franks and Alemanni were invited to cross the Rhine by presents and promises, by the hopes of spoil, and by a perpetual grant of all the territories which they should be able to subdue.* But the emperor, who for a temporary service had thus imprudently provoked the rapacious spirit of the barbarians, soon discovered and lamented the difficulty of dismissing these formidable allies, after they had tasted the richness of the Roman soil. Regardless of the nice distinction of loyalty and rebellion, these undisciplined robbers treated as their natural enemies all the subjects of the empire, who possessed any property which they were desirous of acquiring. Forty-five flourishing cities, Tongres, Cologne, Treves, Worms, Spères, Strasburg, &c. besides a far greater number of deserved a new edition of his works; whose issue may now be darkly perceived. I expected some additional light from the recent edition of the learned Erasmus (Lipsæ, 1733).

* The ravages of the Germans, and the distress of Gaul, may be collected from Julian, Address, Orat. ad c. 7, u. Alam. p. 471. Amian. vi, 11. Isidore, Orig. 2. Zosimus, l. ii, p. 145. Basiliens. l. iii, c. 1.

CHAP.
XIX.

towns and villages, were pillaged, and for the most part reduced to ashes. The barbarians of Germany, still faithful to the maxims of their ancestors, abhorred the confinement of walls, to which they applied the odious names of prisons and sepulchres; and fixing their independent habitations on the banks of rivers, the Rhine, the Moselle, and the Meuse, they secured themselves against the danger of a surprise, by a rude and hasty fortification of large trees, which were felled and thrown across the roads. The Alemanni were established in the modern countries of Alsace and Lorraine; the Franks occupied the island of the Batavians, together with an extensive district of Brabant, which was then known by the appellation of Toxandria,* and may deserve to be considered, as the original seat of their Gallic monarchy. From the sources, to the mouth, of the Rhine, the conquests of the Germans extended above forty miles to the west of that river, over a country peopled by colonies of their own

* Ammianus lvi. 89. This name seems to be derived from the Toxandri of Ptolemy, and very frequently occurs in the history of the middle ages. Toxandria was a country of woods and swamps, which extended from the neighbourhood of Treves to the mouth of the Vahel and the Rhine. See Vatinius, Script. Gallie, p. 498.

* The opinion of P. Dacier, that the Franks never obtained any permanent settlement on this side of the Rhine before the time of Clovis, is refuted with much learning and good sense by M. Huet, who has proved, by a chain of evidence, their uninterrupted possession of Toxandria one hundred and thirty years before the deposition of Clovis. The dissertation of M. Huet was crowned by the Academy of Sciences, in the year 1726, and seems to have been justly preferred to the dissertation of his most celebrated competitor, the Abbe de Baus, an antiquarian, whose name was happily expunged of his works.

name and nation; and the scene of their devastations was three times more extensive than that of their conquests. At a still greater distance the open towns of Gaul were deserted, and the inhabitants of the fortified cities, who trusted to their strength and vigilance, were obliged to content themselves with such supplies of corn as they could raise on the vacant land within the inclosure of their walls. The diminished legions, destitute of pay and provisions, of arms and discipline, trembled at the approach, and even at the name, of the barbarians.

Under these melancholy circumstances, an un-Common of experienced youth was appointed to save and to govern the provinces of Gaul, or rather, as he expresses it himself, to exhibit the vain image of imperial greatness. The retired scholastic education of Julian, in which he had been more conversant with books than with arms, with the dead than with the living, left him in profound ignorance of the practical arts of war and government; and when he awkwardly repeated some military exercise which it was necessary for him to learn, he exclaimed with a sigh, "O Plato, Plato, what a task for a philosopher!" Yet even this speculative philosophy, which men of business are too apt to despise, had filled the mind of Julian with the noblest precepts, and the most shining examples; had animated him with the love of virtue, the desire of fame, and the contempt of death. The habits of temperance recommended in the schools, are still more essen-

CHAP. XIX. and in the severe discipline of a camp. The simple wants of nature regulated the measure of his food and sleep. Rejecting with disdain the delicacies provided for his table, he satisfied his appetite with the coarse and common fare which was allotted to the meanest soldiers. During the rigour of a Gallic winter he never suffered a fire in his bed-chamber; and after a short and interrupted slumber, he frequently rose in the middle of the night from a carpet spread on the floor, to dispatch any urgent business, to visit his rounds, or to steal a few moments for the prosecution of his favourite studies.* The precepts of eloquence, which he had hitherto practised on fancied topics of declamation, were more usefully applied to excite or to assuage the passions of an armed multitude: and although Julian, from his early habits of conversation and literature, was more familiarly acquainted with the beauties of the Greek language, he had attained a competent knowledge of the Latin tongue.† Since Julian was not originally designed for the character of a legislator or a judge, it is probable that the civil jurisprudence of the Romans had not engaged any considerable share of his attention: but he

* The pious life of Julian in Gaul, and the severe discipline which he embraced, are displayed by Ammianus (xvi. 8), who professes to praise, and by Julius Lamell, who affects to censure. (Mansueti, p. 280) a conduct which, in a prince of the house of Constantine, might justly excite the surprise of mankind.

† About Latin speaks different opinions seem. Ammianus, xvi. 8. But Julian, educated in the schools of Greece, always considered the language of the Romans as a foreign and popular dialect, which he might use on necessary occasions.

derived from his philosophic studies an inflexible regard for justice, tempered by a disposition to clemency: the knowledge of the general principles of equity and evidence, and the faculty of patiently investigating the most intricate and tedious questions which could be proposed for his discussion. The measures of policy, and the operations of war, must submit to the various accidents of circumstance and character, and the unpractised student will often be perplexed in the application of the most perfect theory. But in the acquisition of this important science, Julian was assisted by the active vigour of his own genius, as well as by the wisdom and experience of Salust, an officer of rank, who soon conceived a sincere attachment for a prince so worthy of his friendship: and whose incorruptible integrity was adorned by the talent of insinuating the harshest truths, without wounding the delicacy of a royal ear.*

Immediately after Julian had received the purple at Milan, he was sent into Gaul, with a flexible retinue of three hundred and sixty soldiers. At Vienna, where he passed a painful and anxious winter, in the hands of those ministers to whom Constantius had entrusted the direction of his conduct, the Cæsar was informed of the siege and 112.

CHAP.

the same campaign in Gaul.
c. v. 356.

* We are ignorant of the actual names of this excellent minister, whom Julian afterwards created prefect of Gaul. Salust was greatly troubled by the jealousy of the emperor; and we may still read a sensible but polemic discourse (p. 240-257), in which Julian deplores the loss of an intimate friend, to whom he acknowledges himself indebted for his education. See La Harpe, Précis &c. de l'histoire de Julien, p. 174.

CHAP. deliverance of Autun. That large and ancient
XIX. city, protected only by a ruined wall and pusillanimous garrison, was saved by the generous resolution of a few veterans, who resumed their arms for the defence of their country. In his march from Autun, through the heart of the Gallic provinces, Julian embraced with ardour the earliest opportunity of signalling his courage. At the head of a small body of archers, and heavy cavalry, he preferred the shorter but the more dangerous of two roads; and sometimes eluding, and sometimes resisting, the attacks of the barbarians, who were masters of the field, he arrived with honour and safety at the camp near Rheims, where the Roman troops had been ordered to assemble. The aspect of their young prince revived the drooping spirit of the soldiers, and they marched from Rheims in search of the enemy, with a confidence which had almost proved fatal to them. The Alemanni, familiarized to the knowledge of the country, secretly collected their scattered forces, and seizing the opportunity of a dark and rainy day, poured with unexpected fury on the rear-guard of the Romans. Before the inevitable disorder could be remedied, two legions were destroyed; and Julian was taught by experience, that caution and vigilance are the most important lessons of the art of war. In a second and more successful action, he recovered and established his military fame; but as the agility of the barbarians saved them from the pursuit, his victory was neither bloody nor decisive. He advanced, however, to the banks of the Rhine, surveyed the ruins of Cologne, convinced himself of the difficulties of the war, and retreated on the approach of winter, discontented with the court, with his army, and with his own success.² The power of the enemy was yet unbroken: and the Cæsar had no sooner separated his troops, and fixed his own quarters at Sens, in the centre of Gaul, than he was surrounded and besieged by a numerous host of Germans. Reduced in this extremity to the resources of his own mind, he displayed a prudent intrepidity, which compensated for all the deficiencies of the place and garrison; and the barbarians, at the end of thirty days, were obliged to retire with disappointed rage.

The conscious pride of Julian, who was indebted only to his sword for this signal deliverance, was embittered by the reflection, that he was abandoned, betrayed, and perhaps devoted to destruction, by those who were bound to assist him by every tie of honour and fidelity. Marcellus, master-general of the cavalry in Gaul, interpreting too strictly the jealous orders of the court, beheld with supine indifference the distress of Julian, and had restrained the troops under his command from marching to the relief of Sens. If the Cæsar had dissembled in silence so dangerous an insult, his person and authority would have been exposed to the contempt of the world: and if an action so criminal had been suffered to pass campaign,

It is second
p. 224.

² Ammianus (lib. 31. c. 1) agrees much better with the course of this last campaign than Julian himself: who very truly avows that he did nothing of consequence, and that he fled before the enemy.

CHAP. XIX. With impunity, the emperor would have confirmed the suspicions, which received a very specious colour from his past conduct towards the princes of the Flavian family. Marcellus was recalled, and gently dismissed from his office.^a In his room Severus was appointed general of the cavalry; an experienced soldier, of approved courage and fidelity, who could advise with respect, and execute with zeal; and who submitted, without reluctance, to the supreme command which Julian, by the interest of his patroness Eusebia, at length obtained over the armies of Gaul.^b A very judicious plan of operations was adopted for the approaching campaign. Julian himself, at the head of the remains of the veteran bands, and of some new levies which he had been permitted to form, boldly penetrated into the centre of the German cantonnements, and carefully re-established the fortifications of Saverne, in an advantageous post, which would either check the incursions, or intercept the retreat, of the enemy. At the same time Rabatius, general of the infantry, advanced from Milan with an army of thirty thousand men, and passing the mountains, prepared to throw a bridge over the Rhine, in the neighbourhood of Basil. It was reasonable to expect that the Alemanni, pressed on either side by the Roman arms,

^a Ammian. xiv, 6. Ultimo spolia rather more strategically of the military schools of Marcellus. Idem. x, p. 274. And Julian himself, that he would not have been so easily recalled, unless he had given other reasons of offence to the court, p. 278.

^b Germani, non quodam, non utroque, sed longa milite regali- bus compellitur; ut non minus praesentibus auxiliis, ut distantibus imperio milite. Ammian. xvi, 11. Quintus, l. iii, p. 180.

would be soon forced to evacuate the provinces of Gaul, and to hasten to the defence of their native country. But the hopes of the campaign were defeated by the incapacity, or the envy, or the secret instructions of Barbatio, who acted as if he had been the enemy of the Cæsar, and the secret ally of the barbarians. The negligence with which he permitted a troop of pillagers freely to pass, and to return almost before the gates of his camp, may be imputed to his want of abilities; but the treasonable act of burning a number of boats, and a superfluous stock of provisions, which would have been of the most essential service to the army of Gaul, was an evidence of his hostile and criminal intentions. The Germans despised an enemy who appeared destitute either of power or of inclination to offend them; and the ignominious retreat of Barbatio deprived Julian of the expected support: and left him to extricate himself from a hazardous situation, where he could neither remain with safety, nor retire with honour.*

As soon as they were delivered from the fears of invasion, the Alemanni prepared to chastise the Roman youth, who presumed to dispute the possession of that country, which they claimed as their own by the right of conquest and of treaties. They employed three days, and as many nights, in transporting over the Rhine their military powers. The fierce Chnodomar, shaking the

* On the design, and failure of the cooperation between Julian and Barbatio, see Ammianus (l. vii. 11), and Libanius, Orat. 24 p. 172.

to the clamours of the soldiers, and even to the opinion of his council, he exhorted them to justify by their valour the eager impatience, which, in case of a defeat, would be universally branded with the epithets of rashness and presumption. The trumpets sounded, the military shout was heard through the field, and the two armies rushed with equal fury to the charge. The Cæsar, who conducted in person his right wing, depended on the dexterity of his archers, and the weight of his cuirassiers. But his ranks were instantly broken by an irregular mixture of light-horse and of light-infantry, and he had the mortification of beholding the flight of six hundred of his most renowned cuirassiers.* The fugitives were stopped and rallied by the presence and authority of Julian, who, careless of his own safety, threw himself before them, and urging every motive of shame and honour, led them back against the victorious enemy. The conflict between the two lines of infantry was obstinate and bloody. The Germans possessed the superiority of strength and stature, the Romans that of discipline and temper; and as the barbarians, who served under the standard of the empire, united the respective advantages of both parties, their strenuous efforts, guided by a skillful leader, at length determined the event of the day. The Romans lost four tribunes, and two hundred and forty-three sol-

* After the battle, Julian continued to revive the rigor of ancient discipline, by exposing these fugitives to public reproach to the detriment of the whole camp. In the next campaign, these troops easily regained their names. See Ammianus, l. 16, p. 147.

CHAP. XIX.
diers, in this memorable battle of Strasburg, as glorious to the Cæsar,* and as salutary to the afflicted provinces of Gaul. Six thousand of the Alemanni were slain in the field, without including those who were drowned in the Rhine, or transfixed with darts whilst they attempted to swim across the river;† Chnodomar himself was surrounded and taken prisoner, with three of his brave companions, who have devoted themselves to follow in life or death the fate of their chief-tain. Julian received him with military pomp in the council of his officers: and expressing a generous pity for the fallen state, dissembled his inward contempt for the abject humiliation of his captive. Instead of exhibiting the vanquished king of the Alemanni, as a grateful spectacle to the cities of Gaul, he respectfully laid at the feet of the emperor this splendid trophy of his victory. Chnodomar experienced an honourable treatment, but the impatient barbarian could not long survive his defeat, his confinement, and his exile.^a

CHAP.
XIX.

After Julian had repulsed the Alamanii from the provinces of the Upper Rhine, he turned his arms against the Franks, who were seated nearer to the ocean on the confines of Gaul and Germany; and who, from their numbers, and still more from their intrepid valour, had ever been esteemed the most formidable of the barbarians.^b Although they were strongly actuated by the allurements of rapine, they professed a disinterested love of war, which they considered as the supreme honour and felicity of human nature; and their minds and bodies were so completely hardened by perpetual action, that, according to the lively expression of an orator, the snows of winter were as pleasant to them as the flowers of spring. In the month of December, which followed the battle of Strasburg, Julian attacked a body of six hundred Franks, who had thrown themselves into two castles on the Meuse.^c In the midst of that severe season they sustained, with inflexible constancy, a siege of fifty-four days: till at length exhausted by hunger, and satisfied that the vigilance of the enemy in breaking the ice of the river, left them no hopes of escape, the

^a Ammian. xvi, 12. Libanius, Orat. 2, p. 216.

^b Libanius Orat. iii, p. 181, gives a very lively picture of the manners of the Franks.

^c Ammianus, xii, 3. Libanius, Orat. 2, p. 218. The Greek writer, by misapprehending a passage of Julian, has been induced to represent the Franks as consisting of a thousand men; and as his book was always full of the Peloponnesian war, he compares them to the Lacedæmonians, who were besieged and taken in the island of Sphacteria.

CHAP.
XIX.

Franks consented, for the first time, to dispense with the ancient law, which commanded them to conquer or to die. The Cæsar immediately sent his captives to the court of Constantine, who accepting them as a valuable present,² rejoiced in the opportunity of adding so many horses to the choicest troops of his domestic guards. The obstinate resistance of this handful of Franks, apprised Julian of the difficulties of the expedition which he meditated for the ensuing spring, against the whole body of the nation. His rapid diligence surprised and astonished the active barbarians. Ordering his soldiers to provide themselves with biscuit for twenty days, he suddenly pitched his camp near Tongres, while the enemy still supposed him in his winter quarters of Paris, expecting the slow arrival of his convoys from Aquitain. Without allowing the Franks to unite or to deliberate, he skillfully spread his legions from Cologne to the ocean; and by the terror, as well as by the success, of his arms, soon reduced the suppliant tribes to implore the clemency, and to obey the commands, of their conqueror. The Chamavians submissively retired to their former habitations beyond the Rhine; but the Salians were permitted to possess their new establishment of Toxandria, as the subjects and auxiliaries of the Roman empire.* The treaty was ratified by solemn oaths; and perpetual inspectors were appointed to reside among the Franks, with the authority of enforcing the strict observance of the conditions. An incident is related, interesting enough in itself, and by no means repugnant to the character of Julian, who ingeniously contrived both the plot and the catastrophe of the tragedy. When the Chamavians sued for peace, he required the son of their king, as the only hostage in whom he could rely. A mournful silence, interrupted by tears and groans, declared the sad perplexity of the barbarians; and their aged chief lamented in pathetic language, that his private loss was now embittered by a sense of the public calamity. While the Chamavians lay prostrate at the foot of his throne, the royal captive, whom they believed to have been slain, unexpectedly appeared before their eyes: and as soon as the tumult of joy was hushed into attention, the Cæsar addressed the assembly in the following terms: "Behold the son, the prince, whom you wept. You had lost him by your fault. God and the Romans have restored him to you. I shall still preserve and educate the youth, rather as a monument of my own virtue, than as a pledge of your sincerity. Should you presume to violate the

² Julian, ad c. p. c., Athén. p. 260. Libanius, Orat. 7, p. 296. According to the exposition of Libanius, the emperor took capta, which is Blavie in manuscript (Vie de Julien, p. 116) as an honest conviction, and Valentin (ad Ammon. xiii. 7) as a man of the north. But Bæpser (Histoires de France, tom. 1, p. 733), by substituting another word, capta, would suppress both the difficulty and the spirit of this passage.

* Ammian. viii. 8. Zosimus, l. iii. p. 144-150; (his narrative is delivered by a series of dialogues; and Julian. ad c. v. c. Athan. p. 202.) The expression, οὐδὲν ἄλλο παρὰ τὸ ἰσχυρὸν αὐτοῦ, καὶ τὸν βασιλεῖα. This difference of treatment evinces the opinion, that the Saxon Franks were permitted to retain the settlements in Teutoburg.

CHAP. " faith which you have sworn, the arms of the XIX. " republic will avenge the perfidy, not on the " innocent, but on the guilty." The barbarians withdrew from his presence, impressed with the warmest sentiments of gratitude and admiration.*

Makes three expeditions beyond the Rhine, &c.
 327, 328,
 329.

It was not enough for Julian to have delivered the provinces of Gaul from the barbarians of Germany. He aspired to emulate the glory of the first and most illustrious of the emperors; after whose example he composed his own commentaries of the Gallic war.^a Caesar has related, with conscious pride, the manner in which he twice passed the Rhine. Julian could boast, that before he assumed the title of Augustus, he had carried the Roman eagles beyond that great river in three successful expeditions.^b The consternation of the Germans, after the battle of Strasburg, encouraged him to the first attempt; and the reluctance of the troops soon yielded to the persuasive eloquence of a leader, who shared the fatigues and dangers which he imposed on the meanest of the soldiers. The villages on either side of the Meysa, which were plentifully stored with corn and cattle, felt the ravages of an invading army. The principal houses, constructed with some imitation of Roman elegance, were consumed by the flames; and the Caesar boldly advanced about ten miles, till his progress was stopped by a dark and impenetrable forest, undermined by subterraneous passages, which threatened, with secret snares and ambush, every step of the assailant. The ground was already covered with snow; and Julian, after repairing an ancient castle which had been erected by Trajan, granted a truce of ten months to the submissive barbarians. At the expiration of the truce, Julian undertook a second expedition beyond the Rhine, to humble the pride of Surmar and Hortaire, two of the kings of the Alemanni, who had been present at the battle of Strasburg. They promised to restore all the Roman captives who yet remained alive; and as the Caesar had procured an exact account, from the cities and villages of Gaul, of the inhabitants whom they had lost, he detected every attempt to deceive him with a degree of readiness and accuracy, which almost established the belief of his supernatural knowledge. His third expedition was still more splendid and important than the two former. The Germans had collected their military powers, and moved along the opposite banks of the river, with a design of destroying the bridge, and of preventing the passage of the Romans. But this judicious plan of defence was disconcerted by a skillful diversion. Three hundred light armed and active soldiers were detached in forty small boats, to fall down the stream in silence, and to land at some distance from the posts of the enemy. They executed their orders with so much boldness and celerity, that they had almost surprised the barbarian chiefs, who returned in the fearless confidence of intoxication from one of their nocturnal festivals. Without repeating the uniform and disgusting tale of slaughter and devastation, it is sufficient to observe, that Julian dictated his own conditions of peace to six of the haughtiest of kings of the Alemanni, three of whom were permitted to view the severe discipline and martial pomp of a Roman camp. Followed by twenty thousand captives, whom he had rescued from the claims of the barbarians, the Caesar repossessed the Rhine, after terminating a war, the success of which has been compared to the ancient glories of the Punic and Cimbric victories.

* This interesting story, which Zosimus has abridged, is related by Eutropius (in excerpt. Digestorum, p. 15, 16, 17), with all the embellishments of Greek history; but the names of Eutropius, of Ammianus, and of Julian himself, render the truth of it extremely suspicious.

^a Eutropius, the friend of Julian, clearly announces (Orat. de, p. 119) that he has but composed the history of his Gallic campaigns. But Zosimus (l. iii. p. 140) seems to draw several his information only from the Oratio of Julian and the Epistola of Julian. The discourse which is addressed to the Athenians contains an interesting, though general, account of the war against the Germans.

^b See Ammian. viii. 1-18; Xii. 31. and Zosim. l. iii. p. 144; Julian. ad v. v. Julian. p. 280.

CHAP.
XIX.

Restores
the cities of Gaul.

As soon as the valour and conduct of Julian had secured an interval of peace, he applied himself to a work more congenial to his humane and philosophic temper. The cities of Gaul, which had suffered from the incursions of the barbarians, he diligently repaired; and seven important posts, between Mentz and the mouth of the Rhine, are particularly mentioned, as having been rebuilt and fortified by the order of Julian.* The van-

* Ammien. viii. 7. Liban. Gaul. c. 2, p. 212, 190. Of these seven posts, but see all present towns of same consequence; Bingen, Andernach, Bonn, and Noyen. The other three, Trier, Quadenburg, and Cologne, or Heraclea, no longer exist; but there is every reason to believe, that, on the ground of Quadenburg, burgum, quished Germans had submitted to the just but humiliating condition of preparing and conveying the necessary materials. The active zeal of Julian urged the prosecution of the work; and such was the spirit which he had diffused among the troops, that the auxiliaries themselves, waving their exemption from any duties of fatigue, contended in the most servile labours with the diligence of the Roman soldiers. It was incumbent on the Cæsar to provide for the subsistence, as well as for the safety, of the inhabitants and of the garrisons. The desertion of the former, and the mutiny of the latter, must have been the fatal and inevitable consequences of famine. The tillage of the provinces of Gaul had been interrupted by the calamities of war; but the scanty harvests of the continent were supplied, by his paternal care, from the plenty of the adjacent island. Six hundred large barks, framed in the forest of the Ardennes, made several voyages to the coast of Britain; and returning from thence laden with corn, sailed up the Rhine, and distributed their cargoes to the several towns and fortresses along the banks of the river.* The arms of Julian had Surplum, the Dutch have constructed the fort of Schenk, a mere an allusion to the facilities delivery of Holland. See d'Anville Notice de l'Armée Gaulle, p. 182. Hollant, Epère 17, and the notes.

* We may credit Julian himself, Œuv. ed. s. n. s. Atheniæum, p. 392, who gives a very particular account of the resources. Zoolius adds two hundred vessels more, l. iii. p. 143. If we compute the 600 war ships of Julian at only seventy tons each, they were capable of transporting 120,000 quarters (see Athenæum's Weights and Measures, p. 237); and the country which could bear so large an exportation must already have attained an improved state of agriculture.

CHAP. restored a free and secure navigation, which Constantius had offered to purchase at the expense of his dignity, and of a tributary present of two thousand pounds of silver. The emperor parsimoniously refused to his soldiers the sums which he granted with a lavish and trembling hand to the barbarians. The dexterity, as well as the firmness of Julian, was put to a severe trial, when he took the field with a discontented army, which had already served two campaigns, without receiving any regular pay or any extraordinary gratification.*

Civil and political religion of Julian.

A tender regard for the peace and happiness of his subjects, was the ruling principle which directed, or seemed to direct, the administration of Julian.† He devoted the leisure of his winter-quarters to the offices of civil government; and affected to assume, with more pleasure, the character of a magistrate, than that of a general. Before he took the field, he devolved on the provincial governors most of the public and private causes which had been referred to his tribunal; but, on his return, he carefully revised their proceedings, mitigated the rigour of the law, and pronounced a second judgment on the judges themselves. Superior to the last temptation of virtuous minds, an indiscreet and intemperate zeal for justice, he restrained, with calmness and dignity, the warmth of an advocate who proented, for extortion, the president of the Narbonnese province. "Who will ever be found guilty," exclaimed the vehement Delphidius, "if it be enough to deny?" "and who," replied Julian, "will ever be innocent, if it be sufficient to affirm?" In the general administration of peace and war, the interest of the sovereign is commonly the same as that of his people; but Constantius would have thought himself deeply injured, if the virtues of Julian had defrauded him of any part of the tribute which he extorted from an oppressed and exhausted country. The prince who was invested with the ensigns of royalty, might sometimes presume to correct the rapacious insolence of the inferior agents; to expose their corrupt arts, and to introduce an equal and easier mode of collection. But the management of the finances was more safely entrusted to Florentius, praetorian prefect of Gaul, an effeminate tyrant, incapable of pity or remorse; and the haughty minister complained of the most decent and gentle opposition, while Julian himself was rather inclined to censure the weakness of his own behaviour. The Caesar had rejected with abhorrence a mandate for the levy of an extraordinary tax; a new superdiction, which the prefect had offered for his signature; and the faithful picture of the public misery, by which he had been obliged to justify his refusal, offended the court of Constantius. We may enjoy the pleasure of reading the sentiments of Julian, as he expresses them with warmth and freedom in a letter to one of his most intimate friends. After stating

* The troops were broke and late paying, immediately before the second passage of the Rhine. Ammien. xii. 9.

† Ammien. xii. 31. xiii. 6. Maximianus in Exil. l. vi. c. 21. 4.

CHAP. his own conduct, he proceeds in the following
XIX. terms: " Was it possible for the disciple of Plato
" and Aristotle to act otherwise than I have " done? Could I abandon the unhappy subjects " entrusted to my care? Was I not called upon " to defend them from the repeated injuries of " these unfeeling robbers? A tribune who de" serts his post is punished with death, and de" prived of the honours of burial. With what " justice could I pronounce his sentence, if, in
" the hour of danger, I myself neglected a duty
" far more sacred and far more important? God " has placed me in this elevated post; his pro" vidence will guard and support me. Should I
" be condemned to suffer, I shall derive comfort
" from the testimony of a pure and upright con" science. Would to heaven that I still possessed
" a councillorlike Sallust! If they think proper " to send me a successor, I shall submit without " reluctance; and had much rather improve the " short opportunity of doing good, than enjoy a " long and lasting impunity of evil." The precarious and dependent situation of Julian displayed his virtues and concealed his defects. The young hero, who supported, in Gaul, the throne of Constantius, was not permitted to reform the vices of the government; but he had courage to alleviate or to pity the distress of the people.
Unless he had been able to revise the martial

* Ammonius, lib. 3. Julian, Epistolæ, no. cclii. Epistolæ. Each a product almost justified the summation of Memorabilia. Its ill moral spirit alone must, of our barbarous character, not evident from such a child's perpetual profanities, not contra honestum, and contra liber-tatem.

spirit of the Romans, or to introduce the arts of industry and refinement among their savage enemies, he could not entertain any rational hopes of securing the public tranquillity, either by the present conquest of Germany. Yet the victories of Julian suspended, for a short time, the inroads of the barbarians; and delayed the ruin of the Western empire.

His salutary influence restored the cities of Gaul, which had been so long exposed to the evils of civil discord, barbarian war, and domestic tyranny; and the spirit of industry was revived with the hopes of enjoyment. Agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, again flourished under the protection of the laws; and the cities, or civil corporations, were again filled with useful and respectable members: the youth were no longer apprehensive of marriage; and married persons were no longer apprehensive of posterity: the public and private festivals were celebrated with customary pomp; and the frequent and secure intercourse of the provinces displayed the image of national prosperity.* A mind like that of Julian, must have felt the general happiness of which he was the author; but he viewed, with peculiar satisfaction and complacency, the city of Paris; the seat of his winter residence, and the object even of his partial affection.* That splen-

* Lippinot, Orig. Pictorial, in Imp. Julian, p. 29, in Palatine Bibliothec., Gren. Ann. vii, p. 263, 264.

* See Julian, in Musegon, p. 340, 341. The penitence state of Paris is illustrated by Henry Valois (de Ammon. vi, 4), his brother Hedrian Valois, or de Valois, and M. d'Arville (in their respective CHAP. did capital, which now embraces an ample territory on either side of the Seine, was originally confined to the small island in the midst of the river, from whence the inhabitants derived a supply of pure and salubrious water. The river bathed the foot of the walls; and the town was accessible only by two wooden bridges. A forest overspread the northern side of the Seine; but on the south, the ground, which now bears the name of the university, was insensibly covered with houses, and adorned with a palace and amphitheatre, baths, an aqueduct, and a field of Mars for the exercise of the Roman troops. The severity of the climate was tempered by the neighbourhood of the ocean; and with some precautions, which experience had taught, the vine and fig-tree were successfully cultivated. But, in remarkable winters, the Seine was deeply frozen; and the huge pieces of ice that floated down the stream, might be compared, by an Asiatic, to the blocks of white marble which were extracted from the quarries of Phrygia. The licentiousness and corruption of Antioch, recalled to the memory of Julian the severe and simple manners of his beloved Latetia,² where the amusements of the theatre were unknown or despised. He indignantly contrasted the effeminate Syrians with the brave and honest simplicity of the Gauls, and al-respective Nuitiles of ancient Gauls, see Adde de Longueville Descriptions de la France, tom. i, p. 12, 13, and 15. Survey on the Masses de l'Asie, see Asiatick Researches, tom. vi, p. 324-327.

² The name Latetia, Julian in Misopagor, p. 105. Latetia, or Latetia, was the ancient name of the city which, according to the history of the fourth century, assumed the imperial appellation of Paris.

most forgive the intemperance, which was the only stain of the Celtic character.* If Julian could now revisit the capital of France, he might converse with men of science and genius, capable of understanding and of instructing a disciple of the Greeks; he might excuse the lively and graceful follies of a nation, whose martial spirit has never been enervated by the indulgence of luxury; and he must applaud the perfection of that inestimable art, which softens and refines and embellishes the intercourse of social life.

* Julian in Misopogon, p. 312, 320.

CHAP. XX.

The subject, progress, and effects of the conversion of Constantine.—Legal establishment and constitution of the Christian or Catholic Church.

CHAP. XX. THE public establishment of christianity may be considered as one of those important and domestic revolutions which excite the most lively curiosity, and afford the most valuable instruction. The victories and the civil policy of Constantine no longer influence the state of Europe; but a considerable portion of the globe still retains the impression which it received from the conversion of that monarch: and the ecclesiastical institutions of his reign are still connected, by an indissoluble chain, with the opinions, the passions, and the interests of the present generation.

CHAP. XX. In the consideration of a subject which may be examined with impartiality, but cannot be viewed with indifference, a difficulty immediately arises of a very unexpected nature: that of ascertaining the real and precise date of the conversion of Constantine. The eloquent Lactantius, in the midst of his court, seems impatient^a to proclaim to the world the glorious example of the sovereign of Gaul; who, in the first moments of his reign, acknowledged and adored the majesty of the true and only God.* The learned Eusebius has ascribed the faith of Constantine to the miraculous sign which was displayed in the heavens whilst he meditated and prepared the Italian expedition.[†] The historian Zosimus maliciously asserts, that the emperor had embued his hands in the blood of his eldest son, before he publicly renounced the gods of Rome and of his ancestors.[‡] The perplexity produced by these discordant authorities, is derived from the behaviour of Constantine himself. According to the strictness of ecclesiastical language, the first of the christian emperors was unworthy of that name, till the moment of his death; since it was only during his last illness, that he received, as a catechumen, the imposition

^a The date of the Divine Institution of Lactantius has been accurately determined, differences have been started, additions proposed, and an expensive bargain, of two signed editions; the former published during the persecution of Dioclesian, the latter under that of

CHAP.
XX.

Lactant. De Divinitatibus, l. i. c. 1. Theodor. Mor. Periclitat. tom. vi. p. 455-470. Lactant's Constitution, part II. vol. vii. p. 78-80. For my own part, I am almost convinced that Constantine dedicated his dominions to the worship of God, at a time when Galerius, Maximin, and even Licinius, persecuted the christians; that is, between the years 308 and 311.

* Lactant. Divin. Institut. l. i. c. 11, 12. The first and most important of these passages is indeed wanting in twenty-eight manuscripts; but it is found in nineteen. If we weigh the comparative value of these manuscripts, one of 900 years old, in the library of France's library, may be alleged in its favour; but the passage is omitted in the oldest manuscript of Bologna, which the P. de Montfaucon assigns to the sixth or seventh century (Diadema Lucii, p. 483). The taste of most of the editors (except Huet, see Lactant. edit. Harleian., tom. i. p. 306) has felt the genuine style of Lactantius.

* Euseb. in Vit. Constant. l. i. c. 21-22.

† Zosimus, l. ii. p. 104.

CHAP.
XX

of hands,* and was afterwards admitted, by the initiatory rites of baptism, into the number of the faithful.[†] The christianity of Constantine must be allowed in a much more vague and qualified sense; and the nicest accuracy is required in tracing the slow and almost imperceptible gradations by which the monarch declared himself the protector and at length the proselyte, of the church. It was an arduous task to eradicate the habits and prejudices of his education, to acknowledge the divine power of Christ, and to understand that the truth of his revelation was incompatible with the worship of the gods. The obstacles which he had probably experienced in his own mind, instructed him to proceed with caution in the momentous change of a national religion; and he insensibly discovered his new opinions, as far as he could enforce them with

* That sign was always used in making a catechumen (see Bingham's Antiquities, l. vi. c. 1, p. 418. Dion. Chrysost. Hom. des Sacramens, tom. i. p. 482) and Constantine received it in the first time (Hicory, in Vie Constant. l. vi. c. 45) immediately before his baptism and death. From the conversion of these two Emperors, Valentin (see his History) has drawn the conclusion which is universally admitted by Tillamont (viii. des Empereurs, tom. iv. p. 429), and supported with double arguments by Mosheim (p. 783).

† Euseb. in Vie Constant. l. iv. c. 81, 82, 83. The legend of Constantine's baptism at Rome, thirteen years before his death, was invented in the eighth century, as a proper notice for his canonization. Such has been the gradual progress of knowledge, that a story of which Cardinal Bermanus (about 1024) speaks, l. p. 348, See. II. 29. declares himself the unthinking narrator, is now fully supported, even within the walls of the Vatican. See the Antiquitates Christianæ tom. ii. p. 331 &c. a book published with six copies between at Rome, in the year 1711, by Father Mansueti, a learned Jesuit.

safety and with effect. During the whole course of his reign, the stream of christianity flowed with a gentle, though accelerated, motion; but its general direction was sometimes checked, and sometimes diverted, by the accidental circumstances of the times, and by the prudence, or possibly by the caprice, of the monarch. His ministers were permitted to signify the intentions of their master in the various language which was best adapted to their respective principles;² and he artfully balanced the hopes and fears of his subjects, by publishing in the same year two edicts; the first of which enjoined the solemn abstinence of Sunday,³ and the second directed the regular consultation of auspices.⁴ While this important revolution yet remained in suspense, the christians and the pagans watched the conduct of their sovereign with the same anxiety, but with very opposite sentiments. The former were prompted by every motive of zeal, as well as vanity, to exaggerate the marks of his favour, and the evidences of his faith. The latter, till their just apprehensions were changed into despair and

² The quæstor, or secretary, who composed the law of the Thiouda, audax, makes his passage over with indifference,—" audacem in prædicando religionem" (l. xix. tit. ii. leg. ii. The readiness of his eloquent efforts was attended a more devoted and respectful style, including an apostolic address, honore the legal, must pay, and finally worship. See Kiesel. Hist. Roms. l. x. c. ii.

³ Cod. Thiouda. l. ii. tit. viii. leg. i. Cod. Austinian. l. vi. tit. xii. leg. 2. Constantine styles the Lord's day dominica, a name which could not offend the ears of his pagan subjects.

⁴ Cod. Thiouda. l. xii. tit. i. l. i. auspices, is the character of a superstitious, subsequent Rom. vi. p. 247) is under Constantine; but the more valuable Baronius (Annal. Roms. a. d. 321, No. 18) corrects his predecessor with truth and equity.

CHAP. XX.
 resentment, attempted to withdraw from the world, and from themselves, that the gods of Rome could no longer reckon the emperor in the number of their votaries. The same passions and prejudices have engaged the partial writers of the times to connect the public profession of christianity with the most glorious or the most ignominious era of the reign of Constantine.

The paper supersedes
 mine

Whatever symptoms of christian piety might transpire in the discourses or actions of Constantine, he persevered till he was near forty years of age in the practice of the established religion; and the same conduct, which in the court of Nicomedia might be imputed to his fear, could be ascribed only to the inclination or policy of the sovereign of Gaul. His liberality restored and enriched the temples of the gods; the medals which issued from his imperial mint are impressed with the figures and attributes of Jupiter and Apollo, of Mars and Hercules; and his filial piety increased the council of Olympus by the solemn apotheosis of his father Constantius.¹ But the devotion of Constantine was more peculiarly directed to the genius of the Sun, the Apollo of Greek and Roman mythology; and he was pleased to be represented with the symbols of the god of light and poetry. The unerring shafts of that deity, the brightness of his eyes, his laurel wreath, immortal beauty, and elegant accomplishments, seem to point him out as the patron of a young hero. The altars of Apollo were crowned with the votive offerings of Constantine; and the credulous multitude were taught to believe, that the emperor was permitted to behold, with mortal eyes, the visible majesty of their tutelar deity: and that either waking or in a vision he was blessed with the auspicious omens of a long and victorious reign. The sun was universally celebrated as the invincible guide and protector of Constantine; and the pagans might reasonably expect that the insulted god would pursue, with unrelenting vengeance, the impiety of his ungrateful favourite.¹

¹ Theodoret (B. V. c. 18) seems to imagine that Helios gave his son a christian education; but we may be assured, from the superior authority of Eusebius (in Vita Constant. l. vi. c. 37); and who himself was related to Constantine for the knowledge of christianity.

² See the medals of Constantine in Dossage and Huetart. As few coins had retained the privilege of turning, almost all the medals of this age issued from the mint under the sanction of the imperial authority.

As long as Constantine exercised a limited sovereignty over the provinces of Gaul, his christian subjects were protected by the authority, and perhaps by the laws, of a prince, who wisely left to the gods the care of vindicating their own honour. If we may credit the assertion of Constantine himself, he had been an indignant spectator of the savage cruelties which were inflicted by the hands of Roman soldiers, on those citizens whose religion was their only crime.² In the East

¹ The martyrdom of Eusebius, (vil. later passage, Viii.) which was pronounced a few months before the Gallic war, abounds with the most unambiguous evidence of the pagan superstition of Constantine, and of his particular veneration for Apollo, or the sun: to which Julia alludes (Orac. vii. p. 238, versibus 49.) See Commentaries de Spachheim sur les Césars, p. 317.

² Constantine, Orac. ad. Numerian. l. 23. But it might easily be shown, that the Greek translator has improved the sense of the Latin original.

CHAP. and in the West, he had seen the different effects XL of severity and indulgence; and as the former was rendered still more odious by the example of Galerius, his implacable enemy, the latter was recommended to his imitation by the authority and advice of a dying father. The son of Constantius immediately suspended or repealed the edicts of persecution, and granted the free exercise of their religious ceremonies to all those who had already professed themselves members of the church. They were soon encouraged to depend on the favour as well as on the justice of their sovereign, who had imbibed a secret and sincere reverence for the name of Christ, and for the God of the christians.*

A. D. 313,
 March.
 Edict of Milan.

About five months after the conquest of Italy, the emperor made a solemn and authentic declaration of his sentiments, by the celebrated edict of Milan, which restored peace to the catholic church. In the personal interview of the two western princes, Constantine, by the ascendant of genius and power, obtained the ready concurrence of his colleague Licinius; the union of their names and authority disarmed the fury of Maximin; and after the death of the tyrant of the East, the edict of Milan was received as a general and fundamental law of the Roman world.*

original; and the 'aged emperor' might reflect the persecution of Diocletian with a more lively attention than he had actually met in the days of his youth and paganism.

* See Epist. Hist. Eccles. l. 10, c. 33; l. 16, p. 1; and in Vie Const. C. l. c. 36, 37. Constant. Divin. Imperat. l. 1. Constant. de Mort. Porphyrii c. 11.

* Constant. de Mort. Porphyrii c. 48; has preserved the Latin original; and Eusebius (Hist. Eccles. l. 4, c. 15) has given a Greek translation.

The wisdom of the emperors provided for the restitution of all the civil and religious rights, of which the christians had been so unjustly deprived. It was enacted, that the places of worship, and public lands, which had been confiscated, should be restored to the church, without dispute, without delay, and without expence: and this severe injunction was accompanied with a gracious promise, that if any of the purchasers had paid a fair and adequate price, they should be indemnified from the imperial treasury. The salutary regulations which guard the future tranquility of the faithful, are framed on the principles of enlarged and equal toleration: and such an equality must have been interpreted by a recent sect as an advantageous and honourable distinction. The two emperors proclaim to the world, that they have granted a free and absolute power to the christians, and to all others, of following the religion which each individual thinks proper to prefer, to which he has addicted his mind, and which he may deem the best adapted to his own use. They carefully explain every ambiguous word, remove every exception, and exact from the governors of the provinces a strict obedience to the true and simple meaning of an edict, which was designed to establish and secure, without any limitation, the claims of religious liberty. They condescend to assign two weighty reasons which have induced them to allow this universal toleration: the humane intention of consulting the peace and hap-translation of this perpetual edict, which refers to some provincial regulations.

CHAP. XX.

 piness of their people; and the pious hope, that by such a conduct, they shall appease and propitiate the Deity, whose seat is in heaven. They gratefully acknowledge the many signal proofs which they have received of the divine favour; and they trust that the same Providence will for ever continue to protect the prosperity of the prince and people. From these vague and indefinite expressions of piety, three suppositions may be deduced, of a different, but not of an incompatible, nature. The mind of Constantine might fluctuate between the pagan and the christian religions. According to the loose and complying notions of polytheism, he might acknowledge the god of the christians as one of the many deities who composed the hierarchy of heaven. Or perhaps he might embrace the philosophic and pleasing idea, that, notwithstanding the variety of names, of rites, and of opinions, all the sects and all the nations of mankind are united in the worship of the common Father and Creator of the universe.*

Use and beauty of the christian morality.

But the councils of princes are more frequently influenced by views of temporal advantage, than by considerations of abstract and speculative truth. The partial and increasing favour of Constantine

* A panegyric of Constantine, pronounced even at eight months after the edict of Milan, says Gualfred. Chronicle. Legum. p. 4, and Tillamont. Hist. des Empereurs, tom. iv. p. 243, uses the following remarkable expression: "Quoniam veritas una, reges dei sunt, idcirco reges, quos ligandi quædam sunt rationes, quæ eorum est ipse." Idcirco reges, quos ligandi quædam sunt rationes, quæ eorum est ipse. "Idcirco reges, quos ligandi quædam sunt rationes, quæ eorum est ipse." Panegyric. Vet. 31, 32. In explaining Constantine's progress to the Lord, Mehusius (p. 371, &c.) is ingenious, subtle, prolix.

may naturally be referred to the esteem which he entertained for the moral character of the christians; and to a persuasion, that the propagation of the gospel would inculcate the practice of private and public virtue. Whatever latitude an absolute monarch may assume in his own conduct, whatever indulgence he may claim for his own passions, it is undoubtedly his interest that all his subjects should respect the natural and civil obligations of society. But the operation of the wisest laws is imperfect and precarious. They seldom inspire virtue, they cannot always restrain vice. Their power is insufficient to prohibit all that they condemn, nor can they always punish the actions which they prohibit. The legislatures of antiquity had summoned to their aid the powers of education and of opinion. But every principle which had once maintained the vigour and purity of Rome and Sparta, was long since extinguished in a declining and despotic empire. Philosophy still exercised her temperate sway over the human mind, but the cause of virtue derived very feeble support from the influence of the pagan superstition. Under these discouraging circumstances, a prudent magistrate might observe with pleasure the progress of a religion, which diffused among the people a pure, benevolent, and universal system of ethics, adapted to every duty and every condition of life; recommended as the will and reason of the Supreme Deity, and enforced by the sanction of eternal rewards or punishments. The experience of Greek and Roman history could not inform the world how far the system of national manners might be reformed and improved by the precepts of a divine revelation; and Constantine might listen with some confidence to the flattering, and indeed reasonable, assurances of Lactantius. The eloquent apologist seemed firmly to expect, and almost ventured to promise, that the establishment of christianity would restore the innocence and felicity of the primitive age; that the worship of the true God would extinguish war and dissention among those who mutually considered themselves as the children of a common parent; that every impure desire, every angry or selfish passion, would be restrained by the knowledge of the gospel; and that the magistrates might sheath the sword of justice among a people who would be universally actuated by the sentiments of truth and piety, of equity and moderation, of harmony and universal love.*

CHAP. XX.

Theory and practice of passive obedience.

The passive and unresisting obedience, which bows under the yoke of authority, or even of oppression, must have appeared, in the eyes of an absolute monarch, the most conspicuous and useful of the evangelic virtues. The primitive christians derived the institution of civil government, not from the consent of the people, but from the decrees of heaven. The reigning emperor, though he had usurped the sceptre by trea-

* See the allegorical description of Lactantius (liberté) in the text, who is much more passionate and positive than it becomes a general principle.

* The political system of the christians is explained by Grotius, de Jure Belli ac Pacis, l. 1, c. 3, §. 1. Grotius was a republican and an exile, but the weakness of his temper induced him to support the established powers.

son and murder, immediately assumed the sacred character of viceregent of the deity. To the deity alone he was accountable for the abuse of his power; and his subjects were indissolubly bound, by their oath of fidelity, to a tyrant, who had violated every law of nature and society. The humble christians were sent into the world as sheep among wolves; and since they were not permitted to employ force, even in the defence of their religion, they should be still more criminal if they were tempted to shed the blood of their fellow-creatures, in disputing the vain privileges, or the solid possessions, of this transitory life. Faithful to the doctrine of the apostle, who in the reign of Nero had preached the duty of unconditional submission, the christians of the three first centuries preserved their conscience pure and innocent of the guilt of secret conspiracy, or open rebellion. While they experienced the rigour of persecution, they were never provoked either to meet their tyrants in the field, or indignantly to withdraw themselves into some remote and sequestered corner of the globe.* The protestants of France, of Germany, and of Britain, who asserted with such intrepid courage their civil and religious freedom, have been insulted by the invidious comparison between the conduct of the

* Tertullian, Apolog. c. 21, 24, 33. See Tertullian's anonymous Allegation, See England and Scotland against persecution challenged. Ad Scriptum, c. 2. If this assertion be strictly true, it excludes the possibility of drawing from all civil and military employments, which would have compelled them to take an active part in the service of their respective governments. See Moyle's Works, vol. 3. p. 140.

CHAP.
XX.

primitive and of the reformed christians.³ Perhaps, instead of censure, some applause may be due to the superior sense and spirit of our ancestors, who had convinced themselves that religion cannot abolish the unalienable rights of human nature.⁴ Perhaps the patience of the primitive church may be ascribed to its weakness, as well as to its virtue. A sect of unwarlike plebeians, without leaders, without arms, without fortifications, must have encountered inevitable destruction in a rash and fruitless resistance to the master of the Roman legions. But the christians, when they deprecated the wrath of Diocletian, or solicited the favour of Constantine, could allege, with truth and confidence, that they held the principle of passive obedience, and that, in the space of three centuries, their conduct had always been conformable to their principles. They might add, that the throne of the emperors would be established on a fixed and permanent basis, if all their subjects, embracing the christian doctrine, should learn to suffer and to obey.

Divine rights of Constanti-
ne.

In the general order of Providence, princes and tyrants are considered as the ministers of heaven, appointed to rule or to chastise the nations of the earth. But sacred history affords many illustrious

³ See the article Reform 1814, des Vaincus, des Eglises Protestantes, tom. 34, p. 216, 218; and the apologie Reign (tom. II, p. 273). James Bayle, for he was certainly the author of the Revue Helvétique, consult the Théologues Critique de Chaulieu, tom. 3, part. II, p. 145.

⁴ Bayle says it was called, or at least the most celebrated, of the reforms, when he justified the theory of resistance. See the Discours, de Jure Regni opud Bayle, tom. II, p. 25-26, supp. de Raddition.

examples of the more immediate interposition of the deity in the government of his chosen people. The sceptre and the sword were committed to the hands of Moses, of Joshua, of Gideon, of David, of the Maccabees; the virtues of those heroes were the motive or the effect of the divine favour, the success of their arms was destined to achieve the deliverance or the triumph of the church. If the judges of Israel were occasional and temporary magistrates, the kings of Judah derived from the royal unction of their great ancestor an hereditary and indefeasible right, which could not be forfeited by their own vices, nor recalled by the caprice of their subjects. The same extraordinary providence, which was no longer confined to the Jewish people, might elect Constantine and his family as the protectors of the christian world; and the devout Lactantius announces, in a prophetic tone, the future glories of his long and universal reign.* Galerius and Maximin, Maxentius and Licinius, were the rivals who shared with the favourite of heaven the provinces of the empire. The tragic deaths of Galerius and Maximin soon gratified the resentment, and fulfilled the sanguine expectations, of the christians. The success of Constantine against Maxentius and Licinius, removed the two formidable competitors who still opposed the triumph of the second David, and his cause might seem to claim the peculiar interposition of Providence. The cha-

* Lactant. Divin. Institut. l. 1. Eschates in the course of his history, lib. 109. and 110. mentions, repeatedly, the divine right of Constantine to the empire.

CHAP. XX.
 XXX. edict of the Roman tyrant disgraced the purple and human nature; and though the christians might enjoy his precarious favour, they were exposed, with the rest of his subjects, to the effects of his wanton and capricious cruelty. The conduct of Licinius soon betrayed the reluctance with which he had consented to the wise and humane regulations of the edict of Milan. The convocation of provincial synods was prohibited in his dominions; his christian officers were ignominiously dismissed; and if he avoided the guilt or rather danger, of a general persecution, his partial oppressions were rendered still more odious, by the violation of a solemn and voluntary engagement. While the East, according to the lively expression of Eusebius, was involved in the shades of infernal darkness, the auspicious rays of celestial light warmed and illuminated the provinces of the West. The piety of Constantine was admitted as an unexceptionable proof of the justice of his arms; and his use of victory confirmed the opinion of the christians, that their hero was inspired, and conducted, by the Lord of Hosts. The conquest of Italy produced a general edict of toleration; and as soon as the defeat of Licinius had invested Constantine with the sole dominion of the Roman world, he immediately, by circular letters, exhorted all his subjects to imitate, without delay, the example of their pre-*

* The imperfect knowledge of the persecution of Licinius is derived from Eusebius Chap. Hist. 4. 1. c. 6. Vit. Constantini l. 6. c. 45-48; 1. 7. c. 1. Plutarch Vitae mentions his cruelty in general terms.

reign, and to embrace the divine truth of christianity.*

CHAP.
XX.

The assurance that the elevation of Constantine was intimately connected with the designs of Providence, instilled into the minds of the christians two opinions, which, by very different means, assisted the accomplishment of the prophecy. Their warm and active loyalty exhausted in his favour every resource of human industry; and they confidently expected that their strenuous efforts would be seconded by some divine and miraculous aid. The enemies of Constantine have imputed to interested motives the alliance which he insensibly contracted with the catholic church, and which apparently contributes to the success of his ambition. In the beginning of the fourth century, the christians still bore a very inadequate proportion to the inhabitants of the empire; but among a degenerate people, who viewed the change of masters with the indifference of slaves, the spirit and union of a religious party might excite the popular leader, to whose service, from a principle of conscience, they had devoted their lives and fortunes.* The example of his father had instructed Constantine to esteem and to reward the merit of the christians; and in the dis-

Loyalty and zeal of the christian party.

* See the Vita Constantini, l. ii. c. 28, 29, 30, 31.

* In the beginning of the last century, the palace of England was only a palace, and the palace of France only a palace, part of the empire and part of the world; their spirit and power were a constant object of admiration. See the edition which Boulton has given of the palace of England, and afterwards, certainly, translated to the palace of France (Boulton, l. ii. p. 211-240). Boulton was certainly well informed, but somewhat partial.

CHAP.
XX.

tribution of public offices, he had the advantage of strengthening his government, by the choice of ministers or generals, in whose fidelity he could repose a just and unreserved confidence, by the influence of these dignified missionaries, the proselytes of the new faith must have multiplied in the court and army; the barbarians of Germany, who filled the ranks of the legions, were of a careless temper, which acquiesced without resistance in the religion of their commander; and when they passed the Alps, it may fairly be presumed, that a great number of the soldiers had already consecrated their swords to the service of Christ and of Constantine.* The habits of mankind, and the interest of religion, gradually abated the horror of war and bloodshed, which had so long prevailed among the christians; and in the councils which were assembled under the gracious protection of Constantine, the authority of the bishops was seasonably employed to ratify the obligation of the military oath, and to inflict the penalty of excommunication on those soldiers who threw away their arms during the peace of the church.† While Constantine, in his own dominions, increased the number and zeal of his faithful adherents, he could depend on the support of a powerful faction in those provinces, which were still possessed or usurped by his rivals. A secret disaffection was diffused among the christian subjects of Maxentius and Licinius; and the resentment which the latter did not attempt to conceal, served only to engage them still more deeply in the interest of his competitor. The regular correspondence which connected the bishops of the most distant provinces, enabled them freely to communicate their wishes and their designs, and to transmit without danger any useful intelligence, or any pious contributions, which might promote the service of Constantine, who publicly declared that he had taken up arms for the deliverance of the church.^a

* This careless temper of the Germans appears almost uniformly in the history of the conversion of each of the nations. The legions of Constantine were converted with Germanus (Lactantius, l. ii, p. 367); and the most cruel of his troops had been killed with christians. See the last book of the life of Constantine, by Eusebius.

† De Aniqua imperatoris in pace, placuit ut militibus a communione essent. Ariet. Caput iii. The best critics apply these words to the peace of the church.

The enthusiasm which inspired the troops, and perhaps the emperor himself, had sharpened their swords while it satisfied their conscience. They marched to battle with the full assurance, that the same god, who had formerly opened a passage to the Israelites through the waters of Jordan, and had thrown down the walls of Jericho at the sound of the trumpets of Joshua, would display his visible majesty and power in the victory of Constantine. The evidence of ecclesiastical history is pre-

Expectation their and belief of a miracle.

^a Eusebius always considers the second civil war against Licinius as a sort of religious crusade. At the translation of his works, some christian officers had removed their names; or, in other words, had removed to the military version. Their names was afterwards removed by the first edition of the council of Nice; if this portion of the application may be received, instead of the names and general names of the Greek bishops, Bishops, Zeno, and Alex. Atropius, see Burnside, Founders Eccles. Councils, i. p. 72; tom. ii. p. 74. Ammonius.

learned to despise the prejudices of his education, and of his people, before he could erect in the midst of Rome his own statue, bearing a cross in its right hand; with an inscription which referred the victory of his arms, and the deliverance of Rome, to the virtue of that salutary sign, the true symbol of force and courage.^a The same symbol sanctified the arms of the soldiers of Constantine: the cross glittered on their helmets, was engraved on their shields, was interwoven into their banners; and the consecrated emblems which adorned the person of the emperor himself were distinguished only by richer materials and more exquisite workmanship.^b But the principal standard which displayed the triumph of the cross was styled the Labarum,^c an obscure, though

^a Kaysers, in Vit. Constantini, l. i, c. 40. This statue, or at least the cross and inscription, may be verified with more probability in the mosaic, as seen by the church, said of Constantine to stand. Taken directly after the report of Mahomet, the words of the mosaic and people were certainly true for this public monument.

^b Agrippinus regnum Christi non signis viciis
In pulchris effigies crucis et gemmarum reliquias
Aut longas collas ex auro pariterque in uestibus
Hæc signa locatilis, transmissis Alpibus Urbs Servatam intus insubribile Constativum.

* * * * *

Christus perpetuum præstantis crucis in auro
Signatus Labarum, clypeum insignis Cheloni Serpentes: archetypa crucis addita viciis.

Parsons, in Symmachus, l. ii, 384-385.

^c The derivation and meaning of the word Labarum or Labrum, which is employed by Gregory Nazianzen, Ambrose, Prudentius, &c. still remains totally unknown, in spite of the efforts of the critics, who have industriously tortured the Latin, Greek, Spanish, Celtic, Teutonic, Illyric, Armenian, &c. in search of an etymology. See Thuermer, in Act. Med. et Ind. Latinitat. sub voce Labrum, and Gassius, ad Col. Theod. tom. ii. p. 143.

CHAP.
XX.

celebrated name, which has been vainly derived from almost all the languages of the world. It is described* as a long pike intersected by a transversal beam. The silken veil which hung dista from the beam, was curiously enwrought with the images of the reigning monarch and his children. The summit of the pike supported a crown of gold which inclosed the mysterious monogram, at once expressive of the figure of the cross, and the initial letters of the name of Christ.[†] The safety of the labarum was entrusted to fifty guards, of approved valour and fidelity: their station was marked by honours and emoluments; and some fortunate accidents soon introduced an opinion, that as long as the guards of the labarum were engaged in the execution of their office, they were secure and invulnerable amidst the darts of the enemy. In the second civil war Licinius felt and dreaded the power of this consecrated banner, the sight of which, in the distress of battle, animated the soldiers of Constantine with an invincible enthusiasm, and scattered terror and dismay through the ranks of the adverse legions.[‡] The christian

* Bunsen in Vit. Constantini l. 3, c. 30, 31. Marinius (Annal. Eccles. c. c. 312, 34. 26) has engraved a representation of the Labarum.

† Translated X head, minus capite circumflecto, Chabron is another name. Capitulum de m. v. c. 14. Expositio de m. v. c. 14. Expositio tom. II, p. 320 and Expositio (c. c. 312, No. 15) have registered three hundred and twenty-seven specimens (as those of these monograms, which become extremely familiar) in the christian world.

‡ Bunsen, in Vit. Constantini l. 3, c. 7, 9, 9. He introduces the Labarum under the false name of signum; but his remarks seem to emperors, who respected the example of Constantine, displayed in all their military expeditions the standard of the cross; but when the degenerate successors of Theodosius had ceased to appear in person at the head of their armies, the labarum was deposited as a venerable but useless relic in the palace of Constantinople.* Its honours are still preserved on the medals of the Flavian family. Their grateful devotion has placed the monogram of Christ in the midst of the ensigns of Rome. The solemn epithets of, safety of the republic, glory of the army, restoration of public happiness, are equally applied to the religious and military trophies; and there is still extant a medal of the emperor Constantius, where the standard of the labarum is accompanied with these memorable words, By this sign thou shalt conquer.†

11. In all occasions of danger or distress, it was the practice of the primitive christians to fortify their minds and bodies by the sign of the cross, which they used, in all their ecclesiastical rites, in all the daily occurrences of life, as an infallible

The Cross
of Con-
stantine.

vigilante that it was never shown as the standard of an army, till Constantine, above ten years afterwards, declared himself the enemy of Licinius, and the deliverer of the church.

* See Golt. Num. l. vi. tit. xxx. Scorones, l. i. c. 2. Thompson's Chronograph, p. 11. Theodosius lived towards the end of the eighth century, about five hundred years after Constantine. The modern Greeks were not inclined to display in the field the standard of the cross and of christianity; and though they depended on every superstitious hope of defence, the practice of every would have appeared too bold a fiction.

† The Abbe de Voltaire, p. 302, &c. cites several of these medals, and quotes a particular description of a Jewish, the Pere de Aquilino, on this subject.

CHAP. XX.
 preservative against every species of spiritual or temporal evil.* The authority of the church might alone have had sufficient weight to justify the devotion of Constantine, who, in the more prudent and gradual progress, acknowledged the truth, and assumed the symbol, of christianity. But the testimony of a contemporary writer, who in a formal treatise has avenged the cause of religion, bestows on the piety of the emperor a more awful and sublime character. He affirms, with the most perfect confidence, that in the night which preceded the last battle against Maxentius, Constantine was admonished in a dream to inscribe the shields of his soldiers with the celestial sign of God, the sacred monogram of the name of Christ; that he executed the commands of heaven, and that his valour and obedience were rewarded by the decisive victory of the Milvian bridge. Some considerations might perhaps incline a sceptical mind to suspect the judgment or the veracity of the rhetorician, whose pen, either from zeal or interest, was devoted to the cause of the prevailing faction.[†] He appears to have published his deaths of the persecutors at Nico-

* Trevisan, de Constant. c. 5. Athanasius, tom. i. p. 181. The learned Justin Perpetui (Disputes Theol. l. vii. c. 8. 18) has collected many similar passages on the virtues of the emperor, which in the last age endeavored our pious and illiterate.

† Eusebius, de c. 2. c. 14. It is certain that this historical declaration was composed and published, while Licinius, sovereign of the East, still preserved the friendship of Constantine, and of the Christians. Every reader of sense must perceive, that the style is in a very different and inferior degree to that of Eusebius; and such indeed is the judgment of the most learned and judicious media about three years after the Roman victory; but the interval of a thousand miles, and a thousand days, will allow an ample latitude for the invention of declaimers, the credulity of party, and the tacit approbation of the emperor himself, who might listen without indignation to a marvellous tale, which exalted his fame, and promoted his designs. In favour of Licinius, who still dissimbled his animosity to the christians, the same author has provided a similar vision, of a form of prayer, which was communicated by an angel, and repeated by the whole army before they engaged the legions of the tyrant Maximin. The frequent repetition of miracles serves to provoke, where it does not subdue, the reason of mankind; but if the dream of Constantine is separately considered, it may be naturally explained either by the policy or the enthusiasm of the emperor. Whilst his anxiety for the approaching day, which must decide the fate of the empire, was suspended by a short and interrupted slumber, the venerable Apollonius or Modestus, tom. iii, p. 428. Credibility of the Gospel, 4to, part ii, vol. vii, p. 24. These arguments from the title of the book, and from the names of Demetrius and Caracian, are produced by the advocate for Lucianism (see the P. Lasham, tom. ii, p. 24-27). Each of these proofs is singly weak and defective, but their concurrence has great weight. I have often remarked, and shall surely follow the Custom as to calling the passing (whenever he was) Constantine.

¹ Constantine, 4to, v. c. 42. There seems to be some reason in the observation of M. de Vallaure (Greces, tom. i, p. 307), who observes in his opinion of Constantine the superior force of his testimony above the word of Lucian. Yet even this argument is favourably set, reviewed by P. de Tillemont, Fleury, &c. who are fond of increasing their stock of intricacies.

CHAP.
XX.

form of Christ, and the well-known symbol of his religion, might forcibly offer themselves to the active fancy of a prince who revered the name, and had perhaps secretly implored the power, of the God of the Christians. As readily might a consummate statesman indulge himself in the use of one of those military stratagems, one of those pious frauds, which Philip and Sertorius had employed with such art and effect.* The preternatural origin of dreams was universally admitted by the nations of antiquity, and a considerable part of the Gallic army was already prepared to place their confidence in the salutary sign of the christian religion. The secret vision of Constantine could be disproved only by the event; and the intrepid hero who had passed the Alps and the Appennine, might view with careless despair the consequences of a defeat under the walls of Rome. The senate and people, exulting in their own deliverance from an odious tyrant, acknowledged that the victory of Constantine surpassed the powers of man, without daring to insinuate that it had been obtained by the protection of the gods. The triumphal arch, which was erected

* Huet, in these well-known examples, Tullius (Orator in Boetius's translation of Longinus) has discovered a vision of Antigonus, who asserted his sceptre that he had seen a phantom like symbol at night with these words, "In hoc sompno." But Tullius has most consistently omitted to produce his authority; and his own character, literary as well as moral, is not free from reproach (see Classical Dictionary Critique, tom. iv. p. 469). Without relying on the silence of Indorum, Phœnicis, Indis, &c. it may be observed that Polydorus, who in a separate chapter (i. iv. c. 6) has asserted the most military stratagem of Antigonus, is totally ignorant of this remarkable vision.

CHAP.
XX.

about three years after the event, proclaims, in ambiguous language, that, by the greatness of his own mind, and by an instinct or impulse of the divinity, he had saved and avenged the Roman republic.* The pagan orator, who had seized an earlier opportunity of celebrating the virtues of the conqueror, supposes that he alone enjoyed a secret and intimate commerce with the supreme being, who delegated the care of mortals to his subordinate deities; and thus assigns a very plausible reason why the subjects of Constantine should not presume to embrace the new religion of their sovereign.†

III. The philosopher, who with calm suspicion Argues none of it comes in the story examines the dreams and omens, the miracles and prodigies, of profane or even of ecclesiastical history, will probably conclude, that if the eyes of the spectators have sometimes been deceived by fraud, the understanding of the readers has much more frequently been insulted by fiction. Every event, or appearance, or accident, which seems to deviate from the ordinary course of nature, has been rashly ascribed to the immediate action of the deity; and the astonished fancy of the multitude has sometimes given shape and colour, language and motion, to the fleeting but

* Insuperis Divinitatibus, miris magnitudinem. The inscription on the triumphal arch of Constantine, which has been copied by Sponius, Grævæ, &c. may still be perused by every curious traveller.

† Nullum prodigium, aliq[uod] enim illis tantis Divinit. secretum; quæ deliquit natura. Utæ Miraculis cum sint, ut illis aliquando ostenditur. Faugér, Vol. 14, 2.

CHÆR.
XX.

A. D. 321.

uncommon meteors of the air.^a Nazarius and Eusebius are the two most celebrated orators, who, in studied panegyrics, have laboured to exalt the glory of Constantine. Nine years after the Roman victory, Nazarius^b describes an army of divine warriors, who seemed to fall from the sky: he marks their beauty, their spirit, their gigantic forms, the stream of light which beamed from their celestial armour, their patience in suffering themselves to be heard as well as seen, by mortals; and their declaration that they were sent; that they flew, to the assistance of the great Constantine. For the truth of this prodigy, the pagan orator appeals to the whole Gallic nation, in whose presence he was then speaking; and seems to hope that the ancient apparitions^c would now obtain credit from this recent and public event.

A. D. 326.

The christian fable of Eusebius, which, in the space of twenty-six years, might arise from the original dream, is cast in a much more correct and elegant mould. In one of the marches of Constantine, he is reported to have seen with his own eyes the luminous trophy of the cross, placed CHAP.

^a M. Pons (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. IV. p. 431-435) explains, by physical causes, many of the prodigies of antiquity; and Fabricius, who is aided by both parties, easily tries to transfer the celestial signs of Constantine among the vulgar fables of fiction. Ann. tom. vi. p. 15-18.

^b Nazarius Inter Panegy. Vol. 2. 14, 15. It is unnecessary to turn the soldiers, whose undauntedness and generous spirit has been exalted over the pagan host of Maxentius.

^c The apparitions of Coma and Falus, particularly in connection with the Marstonian victory, are proved by historians and pagan monuments. See Coma ad Natus Romanus, 6. 2, 16, 5. 4. Prosa, 11, 12. Valerius Maximus, 4. 1, 6. 8. No. 3. Yet the most recent of these legends is omitted, and indirectly denied by Euseb. Ep.

 above the meridian sun, and inscribed with the XX following words: By this, conquer. This amazing object in the sky astonished the whole army, as well as the emperor himself, who was yet undetermined in the choice of a religion: but his astonishment was converted into faith by the vision of the ensuing night. Christ appeared before his eyes; and displaying the same celestial sign of the cross, he directed Constantine to frame a similar standard, and to march, with an assurance of victory, against Maxentius and all his enemies.* The learned bishop of Caesarea appears to be sensible, that the recent discovery of this marvellous anecdote would excite some surprise and distrust among the most pious of his readers. Yet, instead of ascertaining the precise circumstances of time and place, which always serve to detect falsehood, or establish truth;† instead of collecting and recording the evidence of so many living witnesses, who must have been spectators of this stupendous miracle;‡ Eusebius contents himself with alleging a very singular testimony: that of the deceased Constantine, who,
 many years after the event, in the freedom of con-

* Eusebius, l. x. c. 28, 29, 30. The story of the cross, according to the Ecclesiastical History, is deeply tinct by those adventures, for the purpose of which it is not absolutely certain.

† The narrative of Constantine seems to indicate, that he saw the cross in the sky before he passed the Alps against Maxentius. The story has been used by provincial vanity at Treves. Bouquet, An. des Tillamont, des d'apertins, tom. ix, p. 171.

‡ The poem Tillamont (Mém. Berlin tom. xii, p. 227) refers with a light and useful term of Art, to a veteran and a marquis, who relate as an eye-witness the vision of Constantine.

CHAP.
XX.

veration, had related to him this extraordinary incident of his own life, and had attested the truth of it by a solemn oath. The prudence and gratitude of the learned prelate forbade him to suspect the veracity of his victorious master: but he plainly intimates, that, in a fact of such a nature, he should have refused his assent to any meaner authority. This motive of credibility could not survive the power of the Flavian family: and the celestial sign, which the infidels might afterwards deride,* was disregarded by the christians of the age which immediately followed the conversion of Constantine.[†] But the catholic church, both of the East and of the West, has adopted a prodigy, which favours, or seems to favour, the popular worship of the cross. The vision of Constantine maintained an honourable place in the legend of superstition, till the bold and vigorous spirit of criticism presumed to depreciate the triumph, and to arraign the truth, of the first christian emperor.[‡]

* Golden Cross (in Ann. Carol. 3700 A. D. c. 4.

† The advocates for the cross are unable to produce a single testimony from the fathers of the fourth and fifth centuries, who, in their voluminous writings, repeatedly celebrate the triumph of the church and of Constantine. As these venerable men had not any doubt in a miracle, we may suspect, and the suspicion is confirmed by the ignorance of Juvénal, that they were all unacquainted with the life of Constantine by Eusebius. This tract was corrected by the diligence of those who translated or continued his Ecclesiastical History, and was here represented in various colours the vision of the cross.

‡ Gleditsius was the first who, in the year 1643 (Nat. at Philadelphia 4. 1. c. 6. p. 11), expressed any doubt of a miracle which had been supported with equal zeal by Cardinal Baroniæ, and the

The protestant and philosophic readers of the present age will incline to believe, that, in the account of his own conversion, Constantine attested a wilful falsehood by a solemn and deliberate perjury. They may not hesitate to pronounce, that, in the choice of religion, his mind was determined only by a sense of interest; and that (according to the expression of a profane poet*) he used the altars of the church as a convenient footstool to the throne of the empire. A conclusion so harsh and so absolute is not, however, warranted by our knowledge of human nature, of Constantine, or of christianity. In an age of religious fervour, the most artful statesmen are observed to feel some part of the enthusiasm which they inspire; and the most orthodox saints assume the dangerous privilege of defending the cause of

CHAP.
XX.

The conversion of Constantine—
One might be surer

the Emperours of Maginburg. Since that time, many of the prominent crimes have yielded to great doubt and debate. The objections are urged with great force, by M. Fleury (Dictionnaire Critique, tom. vi. p. 841), and in the year 1774, a Discours of Saurinus, the Abbé du Valer, published an Apology, which does to the praise of learning and moderation.

- * *Luxu Constantia diti ces progressus pariter !
J'ai revencé le culte des Idoles !
Sur les débris de leurs temples fumans
Au Dieu du ciel j'ai prodigué l'encens.
Mais vous vous êtes portés en grandeurs exécrées N'êtes vous jamais d'autre objet que maléfiques !
Les prières vaines n'étaient à vos regards
Qu'un surcroît de la même folie.
L'indulgence, le pardon, les dévotions
S'élevaient sans Idées, devenant sans vertus.
L'or des Chrétiens, leurs intrigues, leur sang Ont cimenté vos fortunes et non rang.*

The poem which contains these lines may be read with pleasure, but cannot be named with decency.

CHAP. XX
truth by the arms of deceit and falsehood. Personal interest is often the standard of our belief, as well as of our practice; and the same motives of temporal advantage which might influence the public conduct and professions of Constantine, would insensibly dispose his mind to embrace a religion so propitious to his fame and fortunes. His vanity was gratified by the flattering assurance that he had been chosen by heaven to reign over the earth; success had justified his divine title to the throne, and that title was founded on the truth of the christian revelation. As real virtue is sometimes excited by undeserved applause, the specious piety of Constantine, if at first it was only specious, might gradually, by the influence of praise, of habit, and of example, be matured into serious faith and fervent devotion. The bishops and teachers of the new sect, whose dress and manners had not qualified them for the residence of a court, were admitted to the imperial table; they accompanied the monarch in his expeditions; and the ascendant which one of them, an Egyptian or a Spaniard,⁴ acquired over his mind, was imputed by the pagans to the effect of magic.⁵ Lactantius, who has adorned the precepts of the gospel with the eloquence of Cicero,* and Eusebius, who has consecrated the learning and philosophy of the Greeks to the service of religion,† were both received into the friendship and familiarity of their sovereign: and these able masters of controversy could patiently watch the soft and yielding moments of persuasion, and dexterously apply the arguments which were the best adapted to his character and understanding. Whatever advantages might be derived from the acquisition of an imperial proselyte, he was distinguished by the splendour of his purple, rather than by the superiority of wisdom or virtue, from the many thousands of his subjects who had embraced the doctrines of christianity. Nor can it be deemed incredible, that the mind of an unlettered soldier should have yielded to the weight of evidence, which, in a more enlightened age, has satisfied or subdued the reason of a Grocius, a Pascal, or a Locke. In the midst of the incessant labours of his great office, this soldier employed, or affected to employ, the hours of the night in the diligent study of the scriptures, and the composition of theological discourses; which he afterwards pronounced in the presence of a numerous and applauding audience. In a very long discourse,

⁴ This domestic was probably the great Osius, bishop of Caesarea, who preferred the pastoral care of the whole church to the government of a particular diocese. His character is magnificently, though inaccurately, represented by Augustine, Tract. 3. p. 704. See Tillemont, Mém. Écclésiast. tom. III, p. 284-287. Osius was accused, perhaps unjustly, of sending those monks with a very ample fortune.

⁵ For Eusebius (in Vita Constant. p. 402), and Zozimus, l. 3, p. 161.

* The quantity of Lactantius was of a moral, rather than of a metaphysical cast. "Erat parva ratio (says the author of the lives) dissimulans et abstinens, et in thronis regibusque in theologia verum." Defensio Fidei Nicene, tom. ii, c. 13.

† Eusebius, with his usual diligence, has collected a list of teachers, above and below hundred authors quoted in the Evangelical Prepositions of Christian. See Bingham's Orig. i. v. c. 6; tom. vi, p. 27-28.

CHAP.
XX.

The fourth eclogue of Virgil.

which is still extant, the royal preacher expatiates on the various proofs of religion; but he dwells with peculiar complacency on the Sybilline verses,^a and the fourth eclogue of Virgil.^b Forty years before the birth of Christ, the Mantuan bard, as if inspired by the celestial muse of Isaiah, had celebrated, with all the pomp of oriental metaphor, the return of the virgin, the fall of the serpent, the approaching birth of a godlike child, the off-spring of the great Jupiter, who should expiate the guilt of human kind, and govern the peaceful universe with the virtues of his father; the rise and appearance of an heavenly race, a primitive nation throughout the world; and the gradual restoration of the innocence and felicity of the golden age. The poet was perhaps unconscious of the secret sense and object of these sublime predictions, which have been so unworthily applied to the infant son of a consul, or a triumvir;^c but if a more splendid, and indeed specious, interpretation of the fourth eclogue contributed to the conversion of the first christian emperor, Vir-

^a See Quintus, Orat. ad Marcum, c. 19, 20. He chiefly depends on a mysterious sentence, composed in the sixth age after the deluge by the Brethren of Syon, and translated by Clement the Latin. The initial letters of the thirty-four Greek verses form this prophetic sentence: Iesus Christ, Rex of God, Saviour of the World.

^b In his paraphrase of Virgil, the emperor has frequently noticed and imposed the literal sense of the Latin text. See Blondel des Sybilles, l. i. v. 14, 15, 16.

^c The different claims of an elder and younger son of Pallas, of Julia, of Thracia, of Macedonia, are found to be incompatible with chronology, history, and the good sense of Virgil.

gill may deserve to be ranked among the most successful missionaries of the gospel.²

CHAP.
XX

continued Devotion and piety begin of Constantine.

The awful mysteries of the christian faith and worship were concealed from the eyes of strangers, and even of catechumens, with an affected secrecy, which served to excite their wonder and curiosity.³ But the severe rules of discipline which the prudence of the bishops had instituted, were relaxed by the same prudence in favour of an imperial proselyte, whom it was so important to allure, by every gentle condescension, into the pale of the church; and Constantine was permitted, at least by a tacit dispensation, to enjoy most of the privileges, before he had contracted any of the obligations, of a christian. Instead of retiring from the congregation, when the voice of the deacon dismissed the profane multitude, he prayed with the faithful, disputed with the bishops, preached on the most sublime and intricate subjects of theology, celebrated with sacred rites the vigil of easter, and publicly declared himself, not only a partaker, but, in some measure, a priest

² See Lewis in Short Past History of England, vol. p. 200, 201. In the conversion of the British nation, the expectation of bishop of London has displayed industry, piety, integrity, and a temporary enthusiasm, which suited his duty without degenerating into passion.

³ The distinction between the public and the secret parts of divine service, the secret catechism and the secret fidem, and the mysteries and other parts of policy laid out over the altar, are very judiciously explained by Thucydides in the Secret Sacrament, b. i. c. 12. p. 12-21; but as, on this subject, the points are necessarily unimportant, a profane reader will depend with more confidence on the sacred Magnum. Antiquities, l. x, c. 5.

CHAP.
XX.

and biotrophant of the christian mysteries.* The pride of Constantine might assume, and his services had deserved, some extraordinary distinction; an ill-timed rigour might have blasted the unripened fruits of his conversion: and if the doors of the church had been strictly closed against a prince who had deserted the altars of the gods, the master of the empire would have been left destitute of any form of religious worship. In his last visit to Rome, he piously disclaimed and insulted the superstition of his ancestors, by refusing to lead the military procession of the equestrian order, and to offer the public vows to the Jupiter of the Capitoline hill.⁶ Many years before his baptism and death, Constantine had proclaimed to the world, that neither his person nor his image should ever more be seen within the walls of an idolatrous temple; while he distributed through the provinces a variety of medals and pictures, which represented the emperor in an humble and suppliant posture of christian devotion.⁷

Delay of his baptism till the approach of death.

The pride of Constantine, who refused the privileges of a catechumen, cannot easily be explained or excused; but the delay of his baptism may be justified by the maxims and the practice of ecclesiastical antiquity. The sacrament of bap-

* See Eusebius in VII. Constant. l. vi. c. 15-25, and the whole tenor of Constantine's writings. The faith and devotion of the emperor has furnished Eusebius with a specious argument, to delay till the early baptism.

⁶ Zosimus. l. ii. p. 103.

⁷ Eusebius in VII. Constant. l. vi. c. 13, 14.

CHAP.
XX.

tion* was regularly administered by the bishop himself, with his assistant clergy, in the cathedral church of the diocese, during the fifty days between the solemn festivals of easter and pentecost; and this holy term admitted a numerous band of infants and adult persons into the bosom of the church. The duration of parents often suspended the baptism of their children till they could understand the obligations which they contracted; the severity of ancient bishops exacted from the new converts a novitiate of two or three years; and the catechumens themselves, from different motives of a temporal or a spiritual nature, were seldom impatient to assume the character of perfect and initiated christians. The sacrament of baptism was supposed to contain a full and absolute expiation of sin; and the soul was instantly restored to its original purity, and entitled to the promise of eternal salvation. Among the proselytes of christianity, there were many who judged it imprudent to precipitate a salutary rite, which could not be repeated; to throw away an inestimable privilege, which could never be recovered. By the delay of their baptism, they could venture freely to indulge their passions in the enjoyments of this world, while they still retained in their own hands the means of a sure and easy absolution.* The sublime theory of the gospel had made a much fainter impression on the heart, than on the understanding of Constantine himself. He pursued the great object of his ambition through the dark and bloody paths of war and policy; and, after the victory, he abandoned himself, without moderation, to the abuse of his triumph. Instead of asserting his just superiority above the imperfect heidnism and profane philosophy of Trajan and the Antonines, the nature of Constantine forfeited the reputation which he had acquired in his youth. As he gradually advanced in the knowledge of truth, he proportionably declined in the practice of virtue; and the same year of his reign in which he convened the council of Nice, was polluted by the execution, or rather murder, of his eldest son. This date is alone sufficient to refute the ignorant and mali-

* The ceremony and practice of baptism which regard to the sacrament of baptism, have been copiously explained by Dens, Christiani, Mystici Sacramenta, tom. 1. p. 5-66; Dens, Mysticon, de Sacram. Ecclesie, capitulum, tom. 1. p. 101; and by Bingham, in his fourth and sixth books of his Christian Antiquities. One circumstance may be observed, in which the jews's churches have immutably departed from the christian usage. The sacrament of baptism differs, when it was administered to infants was immediately followed by confirmation and the holy communion.

CHAP.
XX.

* The fathers, who assumed this general theory, could not deny the natural and necessary efficacy born of a dumb and ignorant. The Jesuitical councils of Christianity could not deny these arguments against their general theory. 1. That we should love and govern even the low and ignorant, and not merely for the reward. 2. That we may be surprised by death without an opportunity of baptism. 3. That although we shall be placed in heaven, we shall only be able to see the good, being confined to the state of righteousness, who have not those spiritual senses with which, with reason, and with glory, Christians in Episcopate, Bishops, Monks, and other Christians, have been favoured, etc. 4. p. 46. I believe that this doctrine of baptism, though opposed with the most passionate complacency, was never mentioned by the general or provincial councils, or by any public act or declaration of the church. The act of the bishops was easily directed on such slighter questions.

tion's suggestions of Zosimus,* who affirms, that after the death of Crispus, the remorse of his father accepted from the ministers of christianity the expiation which he had vainly solicited from the pagan pontiffs. At the time of the death of Crispus, the emperor could no longer hesitate in the choice of a religion; he could no longer be ignorant that the church was possessed of an infallible remedy, though he chose to defer the application of it, till the approach of death had removed the temptation and danger of a relapse. The bishops, whom he summoned in his last illness to the palace of Nicomedia, were edified by the fervour with which he requested and received the sacrament of baptism, by the solemn protestation that the remainder of his life should be worthy of a disciple of Christ, and by his humble refusal to wear the imperial purple after he had been clothed in the white garment of a neophyte. The example and reputation of Constantine seemed to countenance the delay of baptism.† Future tyrants were encouraged to believe, that the innocent blood which they might shed in a long reign would instantly be washed away in the waters of regeneration; and the abuse of religion dangerously undermined the foundations of moral virtue.

* Zosimus, l. ii. p. 104. For this circumstance, there need be but derived and experienced the truest treatment from all the antient writers, except Cardinal Bussertus (c. v. 228, No. 1278), who had venation to employ the infidel on a particular service against the Arian Heretics.

† Eusebius, l. iv. c. 41, 42, 43. The bishop of Caesarea supposes the admission of Constantine with the most perfect candour.

CHAP.
XX.Propaganda house of christians
97.

The gratitude of the church has exalted the virtues and excused the failings of a generous patron, who seated christianity on the throne of the Roman world; and the Greeks, who celebrate the festival of the imperial saint, seldom mention the name of Constantine without adding the title of equal to the apostles.¹ Such a comparison, if it allude to the character of those divine missionaries, must be imputed to the extravagance of impious flattery. But if the parallel be confined to the extent and number of their evangelical victories, the success of Constantine might perhaps equal that of the apostles themselves. By the edicts of toleration, he removed the temporal disadvantages which had hitherto retarded the progress of christianity; and its active and numerous ministers received a free permission, a liberal encouragement, to recommend the salutary truths of revelation by every argument which could affect the reason or piety of mankind. The exact balance of the two religions continued but a moment; and the piercing eye of ambition and avarice soon discovered, that the profession of christianity might contribute to the interest of the present, as well as of a future life.² The hopes of wealth and honours, the example of an emperor, his exhortations, his

¹ See Tillemont, Hist. des Empereurs, tom. IV. p. 426. The church, the Romans join to the darker ages, the Latin theologians, have been desirous of placing Constantine in the catalogue of saints.

² See his civil and church conduct in this life. He was persuaded to say, that whether Christ was punished in person, or in truth, he should still rejoice (1. Jo. 4. 19).

inextinguishable smiles, diffused conviction among the venal and obsequious crowd which usually fill the apartments of a palace. The cities which signalled a forward zeal, by the voluntary destruction of their temples, were distinguished by municipal privileges, and rewarded with popular donatives; and the new capital of the East gloried in the singular advantage, that Constantinople was never profaned by the worship of idols.*
As the lower ranks of society are governed by imitation, the conversion of those who possessed any eminence of birth, of power, or of riches, was soon followed by dependent multitudes. The salvation of the common people was purchased at an easy rate, if it be true, that, in one year, twelve thousand men were baptised at Rome, besides a proportionable number of women and children; and that a white garment, with twenty pieces of gold, had been promised by the em-

* M. de Villeneuve Vilas, Los Hapsones, tomo III, p. 272-273. He defended, with strength and spirit, the single party of General Freyre against some makeshift inventions of the Public Enemy.

* The author of the Minister Bellington at Piddlingburgh (the first issue, 1860, 4 p. 94), advocates a law of Communism, which gave freedom to all the slaves who abhorred anti-slavery institutions. The newspaper did indeed publish a law, which suggested the April 18th observance, perhaps, thus keeping any American states (not Russia) in V.L. Bennett's 1861, n. 17, and Fred. Douglass's 1861, n. 16, who had before 1860, 1861, n. 17, p. 1475. One side important observation related only to the 1861, and the great body of states who were the property of a Christian or pagan master, could not be more colorless and modified by changing their religion. I am ignorant of what guides the whole world was divided in the total absence of guidance in the newspaper's attempt of the newspaper's history.

CHAP.
IX.

peror to every convert.* The powerful influence of Constantine was not circumscribed by the narrow limits of his life, or of his dominions. The education which he bestowed on his sons and nephews, secured to the empire a race of princes, whose faith was still more lively and sincere, as they imbibed, in their earliest infancy, the spirit or at least the doctrine of christianity. War and commerce had spread the knowledge of the gospel beyond the confines of the Roman provinces; and the barbarians, who had disdained an humble and proscribed sect, soon learned to esteem a religion which had been so lately embraced by the greatest monarch, and the most civilized nation of the globe.[†] The Goths and Germans, who enlisted under the standard of Rome, revered the cross which glittered at the head of the legions, and their fierce countrymen received at the same time the lessons of faith and of humanity. The kings of Iberia and Armenia worshipped the

* See Ante. Ecc. Silvestri and Hist. Eccles. Nicephori, Callist. l. vii. c. 24, ap. Reimondus Annal. Eccles. l. vi. c. 224, No. 87-74. Some writers distinguish the two baptisms administered, not to themselves as proselytes, but the emperor Di. Howell (History of the World, vol. iv. p. 14) has not thought to adopt them.

† The conversion of the barbarians under the reign of Constantine is ascribed by the ecclesiastical historians (see Reimondus, l. vi. c. 8, and Thomassin, l. i. c. 21, 24). St. Rufinus, the Latin translator of Eusebius, attempts to be considered as an original author. His information was commonly collected from one of the companions of the apostle St. Ephraim, and from Reimondus, an Iberian proselyte, was most of the Germans. Father Moreau has given an ample compilation of the progress of christianity, in the East and beyond, volume of his great and important work.

god of their protectors; and their subjects, who have invariably preserved the name of christians, soon formed a sacred and perpetual connexion with their Roman brethren. The christians of Persia were suspected, in time of war, of preferring their religion to their country; but as long as peace subsisted between the two empires, the persecuting spirit of the magi was effectually restrained by the interposition of Constantine.* The rays of the gospel illuminated the coast of India. The colonies of Jews, who had penetrated into Arabia and Æthiopia,† opposed the progress of christianity; but the labours of the missionaries was in some measure facilitated by a previous knowledge of the mystic revelation; and Abyssinia still reveres the memory of Frumentius, who, in the time of Constantine, devoted his life to the conversion of those sequestered regions. Under the reign of his son Constantine, Theophilus,‡ who was himself of Indian extraction, was invested with the double character of ambassador

* See in Eusebius the VII. Constant. l. vi. c. 39. the pressing and pathetic epistle of Constantine to favour of his christian brethren in Persia.

† See Barroge, Hist. des Indes, tom. vii. p. 424; tom. viii. p. 333; tom. ix. p. 416. The current allegory of this writer personates Jewish allies to the intolerance of the pope.

‡ Theophilus had been given to his infancy as a hostage by the embassy of the king of Persia, and was educated by the Romans in their religion. The Historia, at which Meib. or Ald. has in the original, got a clause of 1160 or 1160 instead of 1160 in the Latin text. The records were imperfectly acquainted with the Historia; but they are described in the two Indian records of the sixth century, published by Henschen, Geograph. Anecdota, p. 30, 31. Dictionnaire géographique, tome ii. p. 504. Hist. des Indes par le P. de la Croix, tom. i. p. 44.

CHAP.

XX.

and bishop. He embarked on the Red sea with two hundred horses of the purest breed of Cappadocia, which were sent by the emperor to the prince of the Sabaens, or Homerites. Theophilus was entrusted with many other useful or curious presents, which might raise the admiration, and conciliate the friendship, of the barbarians; and he successfully employed several years in a pastoral visit to the churches of the torrid zone.¹

Change of the national religion.

The irresistible power of the Roman emperor was displayed in the important and dangerous change of the national religion. The terrors of a military force silenced the faint and unsupported murmurs of the pagans, and there was reason to expect, that the cheerful submission of the christian clergy, as well as people, would be the result of conscience and gratitude. It was long since established, as a fundamental maxim of the Roman constitution, that every rank of citizens were alike subject to the laws, and that the care of religion was the right as well as duty of the civil magistrate. Constantine and his successors could not easily persuade themselves that they had forfeited, by their conversion, any branch of the imperial prerogatives, or that they were incapable of giving laws to a religion which they had protected and embraced. The emperors still continued to exercise a supreme jurisdiction over the ecclesiastical order; and the sixteenth book of the

NILES.

¹ Palladius, l. iii. c. 4, 5, 6, with Golding's learned observations. The learned writer has been too inquisitive concerning the sort of presents, strange monies, &c.

Theodosian code represents, under a variety of CHAP.
XX.
titles, the authority which they assumed in the government of the catholic church.

But the distinction of the spiritual and temporal powers,* which had never been imposed on the free spirit of Greece and Rome, was introduced and confirmed by the legal establishment of christianity. The office of supreme pontiff, which, from the time of Numa to that of Augustus, had always been exercised by one of the most eminent of the senators, was at length united to the imperial dignity. The first magistrate of the state, as often as he was prompted by superstition or policy, performed with his own hands the sacerdotal functions;† nor was there any order of priests, either at Rome or in the provinces, who claimed a more sacred character among men, or a more intimate communication with the gods. — But in the christian church, which entrusts the service of the altar to a perpetual succession of consecrated ministers, the monarch, whose spiritual rank is less honourable than that of the meanest deacon, was seated below the rails of the sanctuary, and confounded with the rest of the faithful multitude.‡

* See the epistle of Gelasius, ap. Athenæum, vol. i. p. 340. The public administration which Gelasius was forced to assume in the age, contained the same principles of established and civil government which he had severely levelled into the ruins of the former.

† M. de la Bigne (Mémoires de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. vi. p. 28. 29.) has evidently proved, that Augustus and his successors exercised in person all the sacred functions of pontifical maxims; he high-priest of the Roman empire.

‡ Something of a solitary practice had immortally prevailed in the church of Constantinople; but the rigid Ambrose commended Theophrastus

CHAP. XX. The emperor might be saluted as the father of his people, but he owed a filial duty and reverence to the fathers of the church; and the same marks of respect, which Constantine had paid to the persons of saints and confessors, were soon exacted by the pride of the episcopal order.² A secret conflict between the civil and ecclesiastical jurisdictions, embarrassed the operations of the Roman government: and a pious emperor was alarmed by the guilt and danger of touching with a profane hand the ark of the covenant. The separation of men into the two orders of the clergy and of the laity was, indeed, familiar to many nations of antiquity: and the priests of India, of Persia, of Assyria, of Judea, of Ethiopia, of Egypt, and of Gaul, derived from a celestial origin the temporal power and possessions which they had acquired. These venerable institutions had gradually assimilated themselves to the manners and government of their respective countries;³ but the opposition or dation to crime follow the rule, and taught him to know the difference between a king and a priest. See Theodoret, l. v. c. 18.

² At the death of the emperor Maximian, Martin, bishop of Tours, observed the day time for disbandment, and gave it to the presbyter, his companion, before he allowed the emperor to drink: the emperor called on Martin of old. Augustus Severus, in Vit. 47. Martin, c. 25. and Dialogus 2, 7. Yet it may be doubted, whether these extraordinary ceremonies were paid to the bishop or the saint. The knowledge greatly grounded in the church (therefore may be seen in Bingham's Antiquities, l. 2, c. 6, and Velox. ad Theodoret, l. 2, c. 8. See the beautiful monument which Leontius, bishop of Tripoli, inscribed on the emperor. Tillemont, Mém. des Empereurs romains, p. 114. Patrie Apocryphes, tom. ii. p. 119.

³ Tillemont, in the memoirs of his and others, informs us, that the kings of Egypt, who were not already priests, were initiated, after their coronation, into the sacerdotal order.

contempt of the civil power served to cement the discipline of the primitive church. The christians had been obliged to elect their own magistrates, to raise and distribute a peculiar revenue, and to regulate the internal policy of their republic by a code of laws, which were ratified by the consent of the people, and the practice of three hundred years. When Constantine embraced the faith of the christians, he seemed to contract a perpetual alliance with a distinct and independent society; and the privileges granted or confirmed by that emperor, or by his successors, were accepted, not as the precarious favours of the court, but as the just and inalienable rights of the ecclesiastical order.

The catholic church was administered by the spiritual and legal jurisdiction of eighteen hundred bishops; of whom one thousand were seated in the Greek, and eight hundred in the Latin, provinces of the empire. The extent and boundaries of their respective dioceses had been variously and accidentally decided by the zeal and success of the first missionaries, by the wishes of the people, and by the propagation of the gospel. Episcopal churches were closely planted along the banks of the Nile, on the sea-coast of Africa, on the pro-

parts of the bishops under the catholic superiority.

* The numbers are not ascertained by any ancient writer, or ancient catalogue; nor the partial basis of the modern churches are comparatively modern. The patient diligence of Charles A. G. Smith, of Lake Huron, and of Brighton, has lately been successful in the episcopal seat of the catholic church, which was almost synonymous with the Roman empire. The sixth book of the clausula Antiphona is a very accurate map of ecclesiastical geography.

CHAP. XX.
 consular Asia, and through the southern provinces of Italy. The bishops of Gaul and Spain, of Thrace and Pontus, reigned over an ample territory, and delegated their rural suffragans to execute the subordinate duties of the pastoral office.* A christian diocese might be spread over a province, or reduced to a village; but all the bishops possessed an equal and indelible character: they all derived the same powers and privileges from the apostles, from the people, and from the laws. While the civil and military professions were separated by the policy of Constantine, a new and perpetual order of ecclesiastical ministers, always respectable, sometimes dangerous, was established in the church and state. The important review of their station and attributes may be distributed under the following heads: i. Popular election; ii. Ordination of the clergy; iii. Property; iv. Civil jurisdiction; v. Spiritual censures; vi. Exercise of public oratory; vii. Privilege of legislative assemblies.

* Election of bishops.

i. The freedom of elections subsisted long after the legal establishment of christianity; and the

* On the subject of the rural bishops, or Presbyters, who acted in synods, and conferred the minor orders, see Thomassin, Discours de l'Eglise, tom. I. p. 442, &c. and Charbon. Hist. des Sacramens, tom. v. p. 294, &c. They do not appear till the fourth century; and this equivalent character, which had united the journey of the priest, was abolished before the end of the sixth, both in the East and the West.

† Thomassin (Discours de l'Eglise, tom. II. l. 2. c. 1. & l. 3. p. 772-774) has expressly treated of the election of bishops, saying, de his. sine contraria, both in the East and in the West; but he shows a weak partial bias in favour of the episcopal authority. Richard O. M. N. N. (moderate) and Charbon (Hist. des Sacramens, tom. v. p. 108-129) is very clear and concise.

subjects of Rome enjoyed in the church the privilege which they had lost in the republic, of choosing the magistrates whom they were bound to obey. As soon as a bishop had closed his eyes, the metropolitan issued a commission to one of his suffragans to administer the vacant see, and prepare, within a limited time, the future election. The right of voting was vested in the inferior clergy, who were best qualified to judge of the merit of the candidates; in the senators or nobles of the city, all those who were distinguished by their rank or property; and finally in the whole body of the people, who, on the appointed day, flocked in multitudes from the most remote parts of the diocese,* and sometimes silenced, by their tumultuous acclamations, the voice of reason and the laws of discipline. These acclamations might accidentally fix on the head of the most deserving competitor, of some ancient presbyter, some holy monk, or some layman, conspicuous for his zeal and piety. But the episcopal chair was solicited, especially in the great and opulent cities of the empire, as a temporal, rather than as a spiritual dignity. The interested views, the selfish and angry passions, the arts of perfidy and dissimulation, the secret corruption, the open and even bloody violence which had formerly disgraced the freedom of election in the common-

* Incredibile multitudo, qui advenit ad hoc episcopatu (Theod.), and others in various editions of ecclesiastical history, &c. See the Council of Laodicea canonically prohibited such tumults; and Innocentius confirms the right of election to the clergy. Nardell. eccl. hist. l.

CHAP.
XX.

wealths of Greece and Rome, too often influenced the choice of the successors of the apostles. While one of the candidates boasted the honours of his family, a second allured his judges by the delicacies of a plentiful table, and a third, more guilty than his rivals, offered to share the plunder of the church among the accomplices of his sacrilegious hopes.* The civil as well as ecclesiastical laws attempted to exclude the populace from this solemn and important transaction. The canons of ancient discipline, by requiring several episcopal qualifications of age, station, &c. restrained in some measure the indiscriminate caprice of the electors. The authority of the provincial bishops, who were assembled in the vacant church to annunciate the choice of the people, was interposed to moderate their passions, and to correct their mistakes. The bishops could refuse to ordain an unworthy candidate, and the rage of contending factions sometimes accepted their impartial mediation. The submission, or the resistance, of the clergy and people, on various occasions, afforded different precedents, which were insensibly converted into positive laws, and provincial customs; but it was every where admitted, as a fundamental maxim of religious policy, that no bishop could be imposed on an orthodox church, without the consent of its members. The emperors, as the guardians of the public peace, and as the first citizens of Rome and Constantinople, might effectually declare their wishes in the choice of a primate; but these absolute monarchs respected the freedom of ecclesiastical elections: and while they distributed and resumed the honours of the state and army, they allowed eighteen hundred perpetual magistrates to receive their important offices from the free suffrages of the people.* It was agreeable to the dictates of justice, that these magistrates should not desert an honourable station from which they could not be removed; but the wisdom of councils endeavoured, without much success, to enforce the residence, and to prevent the translation of bishops. The discipline of the West was indeed less relaxed than that of the East: but the same passions which made those regulations necessary rendered them ineffectual. The reproaches which angry prelates have so vehemently urged against each other, serve only to expose their common guilt, and their mutual indiscretion.

* The epistle of Soliman Apollinaris (p. 284 v. l. 10) exhibits some of the weakness of the Gallian church; and Gaul was too polluted and too corrupt, than the East.

† A synodical rule was likewise introduced by law as by custom; either the bishops or the people chose two of the three candidates who had been named by the other party.

15. The bishops alone possessed the faculty of ^{the Ordination of} spiritual generation; and this extraordinary privilege might compensate, in some degree, for the painful celibacy[†] which was imposed as a virtue,

* All the examples quoted by Theodosius (Discipline des Evêques, tom. ii, c. 11, et c. 12, p. 104-114) appear to be extraordinary acts of power, and even of oppression. The constitution of the 1st. year of Arcadius is justified by Theodosius as a more regular provision (lib. 1, c. 11).

† The celibacy of the clergy during the first five or six centuries, is a subject of curiosity, and indeed of controversy, which has been very diligently examined. See in particular Theodosius, Discipline

the prudence of the laws might constrain the reluctant, and protect the distressed; and the imposition of hands for ever bestowed some of the most valuable privileges of civil society. The whole body of the catholic clergy, more numerous perhaps than the legions, was exempted by the emperors from all service, private or public, all municipal offices, and all personal taxes and contributions, which pressed on their fellow-citizens with intolerable weight; and the duties of their holy profession were accepted as a full discharge of their obligations to the republic.* Each bishop acquired an absolute and inalienable right to the perpetual obedience of the clerk whom he ordained: the clergy of each episcopal church, with its dependant parishes, formed a regular and permanent society; and the cathedrals of Constantinople* and Carthage† maintained their pe-number of the Jernin was captured by Cyprian. Old Jernin, Timothy stopped his mouth, but he should make a sincere confession, it took eight hours. He looks strong.

* The character of immortality, which the theologians have the habit of ascribing, is described in the first part of the Treatise on faith, and is illustrated with admirable precision by the learned Father, Reg. whose mind was harassed by the sceptical propensities of a lifetime and a conscience.

[illegible]

⁴ Epilobium ciliatum var. cordifolium (L.) DC. prostratum vel compressum, sicut quae praecedunt, sunt habitus robusti. Vides Thunberg, de Fructu Vandal. v. 8, p. 176, tab. 80, fig. 1.

CHAP.
XX.

CONTINUED.

cular establishment of five hundred ecclesiastical ministers. Their ranks¹ and numbers were immensely multiplied by the superstition of the times, which introduced into the church the splendid ceremonies of a Jewish or pagan temple; and a long train of priests, deacons, sub-deacons, acolythes, exorcists, readers, singers, and door-keepers, contributed, in their respective stations, to swell the pomp and harmony of religious worship. The clerical name and privilege were extended to numerous fraternities, who devoutly supported the ecclesiastical throne.² Six hundred parabolani, or adventurers, visited the sick at Alexandria; eleven hundred coepitæ, or grave-diggers, buried the dead at Constantinople; and the swarms of monks, who arose from the Nile, overspread and darkened the face of the christian world.

see Fab-
rius.
v. 21. p. 22.

III. The edict of Milan secured the revenue as well as the peace of the church.³ The christians not only recovered the lands and houses of which they had been stripped by the persecuting laws of revenue of a more generous than enlarged nature: the oppression of the Vandals.

¹ The number of poor monks has been fixed in the Latin church, exclusive of the spiritual character. But the same inferior ranks, the same orders, are now reduced to idleness and indigence.

² See Old Testament, l. vii. c. 11. v. 47, 48. Baronius's Commentary, and the Protestant History of Arianism, show the danger of these poor institutions, which also describe the pain of their indolent support.

³ The edict of Milan (l. vi. c. 11. v. 47) acknowledges, by naming that they should be a source of wealth (wealth) as for the poor, that the emperor had intended to suppress the institution. Such a national institution of the superstitious must have been revised in all the kingdoms as a result of all the

Diocletian, but they acquired a perfect title to all the possessions which they had hitherto enjoyed by the connivance of the magistrate. As soon as christianity became the religion of the emperor and the empire, the national clergy might claim a decent and honourable maintenance; and the payment of an annual tax might have delivered the people from the more oppressive tribute, which superstition imposes on her votaries. But as the wants and expenses of the church increased with her prosperity, the ecclesiastical order was still supported and enriched by the voluntary oblations of the faithful. Eight years after the edict of Milan, Constantine granted to all his subjects the free and universal permission of bequeathing their fortunes to the holy catholic church;^a and their devout liberality, which during their lives was checked by luxury or avarice, flowed with a profuse stream at the hour of their death. The wealthy christians were encouraged by the example of their sovereign. An absolute monarch, who is rich without patrimony, may be charitable without merit; and Constantine too easily believed that he should purchase the favour of heaven, if he maintained the idle at the expense of the industrious, and distributed among the saints the wealth of the republic. The same messenger who carried over ^a Habeant singuli quique Christiani institutionem Catholicam (sedulas) voluntarias donationes, ad eorum hominum quod optaverit reliquiam. Cod. Theodos. l. viii. tit. ii. leg. 4. This law was published at Rome, A. D. 311, at a time when Constantine might derive the probability of a triumph with the emperor of the East.

CHAP.
XX.

to Africa the head of Maxentius, might be entrusted with an epistle to Casilian, bishop of Carthage. The emperor acquaints him, that the treasures of the province are directed to pay into his hands the sum of three thousand fulles, or eighteen thousand pounds sterling, and to obey his farther requisitions for the relief of the churches of Africa, Numidia, and Mauritania.¹ The liberality of Constantine increased in a just proportion to his faith, and to his views. He assigned in each city a regular allowance of corn, to supply the fund of ecclesiastical charity, and the persons of both sexes who embraced the monastic life, became the peculiar favourites of their sovereign. The christian temples of Antioch, Alexandria, Jerusalem, Constantinople, &c. displayed the ostentatious piety of a prince, ambitious in a declining age to equal the perfect labours of antiquity.² The form of these religious edifices was simple and oblong; though they might sometimes swell into the shape of a dome, and sometimes branch into the figure of a cross. The timbers were framed for the most part of cedars of Lebanon; the roof was covered with tiles, perhaps of gilt brass; and the walls, CHAP.

¹ Constant. Hist. Eccles. l. 3. c. 24. in VIL. Constant. in P. 1. c. 28. His repeatedly exhortations to the liberality of the christianized Jews, which the bishop almost led to a suppression of tithes, and even of tithes.

² Eusebius, Hist. Eccles. l. 10. c. 15. The bishop of Caesarea, who visited and praised the state of his palace, possessed in public an accurate description of the church of Jerusalem in VIL. Constant. in P. 1. c. 28. It no longer exists; but he has preserved in the life of Constantine c. 33. a short account of the architecture and ornaments. His discourse contains the church of the holy apostles at Constantinople (l. 10. c. 33).

the columns, the pavement, were incrustated with IX variegated marbles. The most precious ornaments of gold and silver, of silk and gems, were profusely dedicated to the service of the altar; and this spacious magnificence was supported on the solid and perpetual basis of landed property. In the space of two centuries, from the reign of Constantine to that of Justinian, the eightieth hundred churches of the empire were enriched by the frequent and unalienable gifts of the prince and people. An annual income of six hundred pounds sterling may be reasonably assigned to the bishops, who were placed at an equal distance between riches and poverty,* but the standard of their wealth invariably rose with the dignity and opulence of the cities which they governed. An authentic but imperfect† rent-roll specifies some houses, shops, gardens, and farms, which belonged to the three families of Rome, St. Peter, St. Paul, and St. John Lateran, in the provinces of Italy, Africa, and the East. They produce, besides a reserved rent of oil, linen, paper, musquitos, &c. a clear annual revenue of twenty-two thousand pieces of gold, or twelve thousand

* See Justinian, Novell. cxxxix. §. The revenue of the patriarchs, and the most wealthy bishops, is not expressed; the highest annual valuation of a bishopric is stated at thirty, and the lowest at ten, pounds of gold; the real value might be calculated from these valuations, but these valuations are much below the real value.

† See Basilides (above). Euseb. A. D. 324, lib. vii. c. 23, 24. Every estate which comes from the Vatican is partly exempted; yet these estates have an ancient and authentic title; and it is at least evident, that, if bishops, they were taxed in a period when farms, not bishoprics, were the objects of popular envy.

CHAP. pounds sterling. In the age of Constantine and VI. Justinian, the bishops no longer possessed, perhaps they no longer deserved, the unsuspecting confidence of their clergy and people. The ecclesiastical revenues of each diocese were divided into four parts: for the respective uses, of the bishop himself, of his inferior clergy, of the poor, and of the public worship; and the abuse of this sacred trust was strictly and repeatedly checked.² The patrimony of the church was still subject to all the public impositions of the state.³ The clergy of Rome, Alexandria, Thessalonica, &c. might solicit and obtain some partial exemptions; but the premature attempt of the great council of Rimini, which aspired to universal freedom was successfully resisted by the son of Constantine.⁴

² See Thomassin, Discipline de l'Eglise, tom. III, l. II, c. 13, 14, 15, p. 554-566. The legal division of the ecclesiastical revenue does not appear to have been established in the time of Ambrose and Chrysostom. Socrates and Sozomen, who were bishops of Rome in the latter part of the fifth century, mention it in their pastoral letters as a general law, which was strictly enforced by the canons of Italy.

³ Ambrose, the most strenuous advocate of ecclesiastical privileges, admitted without a murmur in the payment of the land-tax. "Si ad tributum populi deferimus, non arguimus; quia ecclesiasticæ voluntati non tribuimus; sed omnes quæ sunt Civitatis Curæ, ut quæ sunt Dei et Imperii tributaria Curæ etiam non negamus." Mansi'si Selectæ de Imperio this letter as an act of piety rather than of duty (Annot. Edict. s. c. 387) i. 161 the words, if not the intentions of Ambrose, are more amply explained by Thomassin, Discipline de l'Eglise, tom. III, l. II, c. 14, p. 568.

⁴ In Athanasius's epistle upon ecclesiastical privileges towards heathens, contra de gentilibus prætoribus art. 21, § 1, upon subordination of ecclesiastical persons, a public transgression concerned the jurisdiction of the secular power, and would involve the bishop in a capital crime.

14. The Latin clergy, who erected their tribunal on the ruins of the civil and common law, have modestly accepted as the gift of Constantine,¹ the independent jurisdiction, which was the fruit of time, of accident, and of their own industry. But the liberality of the christian emperors had actually endowed them with some legal prerogatives, which secured and dignified the sacerdotal character.² 1. Under a despotic government, the bishops alone enjoyed and asserted the inestimable privilege of being tried only by their peers; and even in a capital accusation, a synod of their brethren were the sole judges of their guilt or innocence. Such a tri-

CHAP.
XX.
.....
10. CIVIL JURISDICTION.

Foot. Theod. L. vii. tit. 1. §. 14. Had the synod of Worms had had this power, such practical point might have solved the speculative question.

¹ Euseb. Constantin. lib. vii. Constant. l. 14. s. 37. and Sozomen. lib. 4. c. 3. By so we assured that the episcopal jurisdiction was established and confirmed by Constantine; but the story of a famous edict, which was never fully inserted in the Theodosian Code (see at the end, tom. vi. p. 383), is demonstrated by Grotius to be a most satisfactory mistake. It is strange that M. de Meuschen, who was a lawyer as well as a philosopher, should allege the edict of Constantine (Repos. des Lais. l. xxi. c. 37), without observing any mistake.

² The subject of ecclesiastical jurisdiction has been treated in a tone of passion, of prejudice, and of hatred. Two of the latest books which have fallen into my hands, are the Lessons of Canon Law, by the Abbe de Faur, and the Civil History of Religion, by Guizot. Their mutualness was the effect of situation as well as of temper. Faur was a French ecclesiastic, who possessed the authority of the parliament; Guizot was no Catholic lawyer, who dreaded the power of the church. And here let me observe, that as the general impressions which I elsewhere are the result of many perusals and imperfect hints, I must either refer the reader to those modern writers who have separately treated the subject, or omit these notes as a disagreeable and disproportioned task.

CHAP. XX.
bunal, unless it was inflamed by personal resentment or religious discord, might be favourable, or even partial, to the sacerdotal order: but Constantine was satisfied,* that secret impunity would be less pernicious than public scandal: and the Nicene council was edified by his public declaration, that if he surprised a bishop in the act of adultery, he should cast his imperial mantle over the episcopal sinner. 2. The domestic jurisdiction of the bishops was at once a privilege and a restraint of the ecclesiastical order, whose civil causes were decently withdrawn from the cognizance of a secular judge. Their venial offences were not exposed to the shame of a public trial or punishment; and the gentle correction, which the tenderness of youth may endure from its parents or instructors, was inflicted by the temperate severity of the bishops. But if the clergy were guilty of any crime which could not be sufficiently expiated by their degradation from an honourable and beneficial profession, the Roman magistrate drew the sword of justice, without any regard to ecclesiastical immunities. 3. The arbitration of the bishops was ratified by a positive law: and the judges were instructed to execute, without appeal or delay, the episcopal decrees, whose validity had hitherto depended on the consent of the parties. The conversion of the magistrates themselves, and of the whole empire, might gradually remove the fears and scruples of the clergy.

* TITMUS has collected some Historia Theodora, 86, the sentiments and language of Constantine. Memo. Eccles. tom. III. p. 145, 146.

tians. But they still resorted to the tribunal of the bishops, whose abilities and integrity they esteemed; and the venerable Ambrose enjoyed the satisfaction of complaining that his spiritual functions were perpetually interrupted by the insidious labour of deciding the claim or the possession of silver and gold, of lands and cattle. 4. The ancient privilege of sanctuary was transferred to the christian temples, and extended, by the liberal piety of the younger Theodosius, to the precincts of consecrated ground.* The fugitive, and even guilty, supplicants, were permitted to implore, either the justice, or the mercy, of the deity and his ministers. The rash violence of despotism was suspended by the mild interposition of the church and the lives or fortunes of the most eminent subjects might be protected by the mediation of the bishop.

5. The bishop was the perpetual censor of the morals of his people. The discipline of penance was digested into a system of canonical jurisprudence,† which accurately defined the duty of

* See Cod. Theod. l. de. de. ult. leg. 4. In the middle of the Fifth Century, it, p. 122, &c. &c. is an excellent discourse on the subject, drawn, I think, not from the writings of Ambrose, but from those of Augustine. He justly observes, that ancient times might perhaps contain fifteen or twenty temples or sanctuaries; a number which is proved may be found in Italy within the walls of a single city.

† The political jurisprudence was commonly improved by the censors of the republic. But as many laws were still left to the discretion of the judges, they necessarily established, after the example of the Roman senate, the rules of discipline which they proposed to observe. Among the canonical statutes of the fourth century, those of Basil the Great were the most celebrated. They are inserted in the Paraphrase of Bede, from ii. p. 17-189.

CHAP. XX. private or public confession, the rules of evidence, the degrees of guilt, and the measure of punishment. It was impossible to execute this spiritual censure, if the christian pontiff, who punished the obnoxious sins of the multitude, respected the conspicuous vices and destructive crimes of the magistrate; but it was impossible to arraign the conduct of the magistrate, without controlling the administration of civil government. Some considerations of religion, or royalty, or fear, protected the sacred persons of the emperors from the zeal or resentment of the bishops; but they boldly censured and excommunicated the subordinate tyrants, who were not invested with the majesty of the purple. St. Athanasius excommunicated one of the ministers of Egypt; and the interdict which he pronounced, of fire and water, was solemnly transmitted to the churches of Cappadocia.¹ Under the reign of the younger Theodosius, the polite, the eloquent Synesius, one of the descendants of Hercules,² filled the episcopal seat of Ptolemais, and was translated by Cardinal Hist. des Grecs, tom. iv, p. 412-417.

¹ Basil Episc. xviii, in Epistolæ Athanasii Episcopi, &c. p. 219. No. 111, who declares that he purposely relates it, to exert the power that they were not entitled from a sentence of excommunication. In the opinion, even a royal head is not safe from the thunders of the Vatican; and the cardinal shows himself much more consistent than the lawyers and theologians of my Catholic church.

² The long series of his ancestors, as high as Mithridates, the last Dard king of Bithynia, and the fifth or third descent from Hercules, was inscribed in the public registers of Cyrene, a Carthaginiensis. (Epistolæ Synesii, tom. i, p. 187, edit. Froben.) Such a powerful illustrious pedigree of seven hundred years, without adding the royal surname of Hercules, cannot be equalled in the history of mankind.

near the ruins of ancient Cyrene,³ and the philosophic bishop supported with dignity the character which he had resumed with reluctance.⁴ He vanquished the monster of Libya, the president Andronicus, who abused the authority of a royal office, invented new modes of rapine and torture, and aggravated the guilt of oppression and that of sacrilege.⁵ After a fruitless attempt to reclaim the haughty magistrate by mild and religious admonition, Synesius proceeds to inflict the last sentence of ecclesiastical justice⁶, which

³ Synesius, de Regno, p. 81 probably describes the ruins and ruined state of Cyrene, near Silius, within four or seven, and it is also near the ruins, epist. ad Greg. in exil., ad Greg. quaten. Fulgentem, a few steps, 82 miles to the westward of Cyrene, named the metropolitan bishopric of the Pentapolis, or Upper Libya, which was afterwards transferred to Scythia. See Meningius Triclin. p. 47, 48, 722. Cathartes Geograph. Ann. v. part II. p. 12-14. Caroline & St. Pauli Geograph. Sacra, p. 275, et Antiqua Geographia Antiqua, tom. III, p. 41, 44. Mémorial de l'Académie des Inscriptions, tom. III, p. 302-303.

⁴ Synesius had previously expressed his own qualifications (Epist. i. v., p. 246-250). He boasts of his education and genius; he was competent of supporting a list of soldiers; he disdained the revenues; and he refused to present himself to the people, unless he might be permitted to philosophize at home. Theophilus, primate of Carthage, who knew his worth, accepted this extraordinary recommendation. See the life of Synesius in Théodore Mom. Kirken, tom. III, p. 400-424.

⁵ See the inventory of Synesius, Epist. lxxi., p. 191-194. The prosecution of Andronicus was royal; since he was a native of Syracuse, he had some power. The instruments of torture are minutely specified, the scourges, or pines, the lemnisci, the whips, the plectra, the verbera, and the catenæ, that cruelly pressed or extended the fingers, the feet, the arms, the legs, and the hips of the victims.

⁶ The sentence of excommunication is expressed in a rhetorical style. Cyrenensis, Epist. lxxi., p. 191-203. The method of applying this white scabbard, though somewhat unjust, was improved into the usual interdicts.

CHAP.
XX

devotes Andronicus, with his associates and their family, to the abhorrence of earth and heaven. The impenitent sinners, more cruel than Phalaris or Scamander, more destructive than war, pestilence, or a cloud of locusts, are deprived of the name and privileges of christians, of the participation of the sacraments, and of the hope of paradise. The bishop exhorts the clergy, the magistrates, and the people, to renounce all society with the enemies of Christ; to exclude them from their houses and tables; and to refuse them the common offices of life, and the decent rites of burial. The church of Ptolemais, obscure and contemptible as she may appear, addresses this declaration to all her sister churches of the world; and the profane, who reject her docters, will be involved in the guilt and punishment of Andronicus and his infamous followers. These spiritual terrors were enforced by a dexterous application to the Byzantine court; the trembling president implored the mercy of the church; and the descendant of Hercules enjoyed the satisfaction of ridding a prostrate tyrant from the ground. Such principles, and such examples, insensibly prepared the triumph of the Roman pontiffs, who have trampled on the necks of kings.

11. From
the state of public reading.

VI. Every popular government has experienced the effects of rude or artificial eloquence. The coldest nature is animated, the firmest reason is moved, by the rapid communication of the prevailing im-

¹ The Byzantine, Epist. viii. p. 485, 487. Epist. ix. p. 488, 489. Epist. x. p. 489, 490.

CHAP.
XX.

pulse; and each hearer is affected by his own passions, and by those of the surrounding multitude. The ruin of civil liberty has adorned the demagogues of Athens, and the tribunes of Rome; the custom of preaching, which seems to constitute a considerable part of christian devotion, had not been introduced into the temples of antiquity; and the ears of monarchs were never invaded by the harsh sound of popular eloquence, till the pulpits of the empire were filled with sacred orators, who possessed some advantages unknown to their profane predecessors.* The arguments and rhetoric of the tribune were instantly opposed, with equal arms, by skilful and resolute antagonists; and the cause of truth and reason might derive an accidental support from the conflict of hostile passions. The bishop, or some distinguished presbyter, to whom he cautiously delegated the powers of preaching, harangued without the danger of interruption or reply, to a submissive multitude, whose minds had been prepared and subdued by the awful circumstances of religion. Such was the strict subordination of the catholic church, that the same concerted sounds might issue at once from an hundred pulpits of Italy or Egypt, if they were tuned,^b by the master hand of the Roman se

* See Thomson (Discipline de l'Eglise, tom. 2, & 12, c. 25, p. 170, 171) and Mosheim (Antiquities, vol. 2, lib. 2, c. 1, § 1, p. 107, 117). Preaching was considered as the most important office of the bishop; but this function was sometimes committed to his presbyters or Clergymen and Augustins.

^b Quousq. Thomassin used this expression, and perceived that it was incorrect, who called on government the master of his people, he thought it not necessary to suppress all government. The bishop reflects at this word being so qualified by his successor, and severely told by his

CHAP. XX.
 Alexandrian primate. The design of this institution was laudable, but the fruits were not always salutary. The preachers recommended the practice of the social duties; but they exalted the perfection of monastic virtue, which is painful to the individual, and useless to mankind. Their charitable exhortations betrayed a secret wish, that the clergy might be permitted to manage the wealth of the faithful, for the benefit of the poor. The most sublime representations of the attributes and laws of the deity were sullied by an idle mixture of metaphysical subtleties, puerile rites, and fictitious miracles; and they expatiated, with the most fervent zeal, on the religious merit of hating the adversaries, and obeying the ministers, of the church. When the public peace was distracted by heresy and schism, the sacred orator sounded the trumpet of discord and perhaps of sedition. The understandings of their congregations were perplexed by mystery, their passions were inflamed by invectives; and they rushed from the christian temples of Antioch or Alexandria, prepared either to suffer or to inflict martyrdom. The corruption of taste and language is strongly marked in the vehement declamations of the Latin bishops; but the compositions of Gregory and Chrysostom have been compared with the most splendid models of Attic, or at least of Asiatic, eloquence.¹

1. "When pulpit, from persecution," &c. See Heylin's Life of Archbishop Laud, p. 113.

² These authors cannot acknowledge, that, as they were destitute of the gift of miracles, they endeavoured to supply the arts of eloquence.

CHAP.
XX.III. Privileges of legislative assemblies.

VII. The representatives of the christian republic were regularly assembled in the spring and autumn of each year; and these synods diffused the spirit of ecclesiastical discipline and legislation through the hundred and twenty provinces of the Roman world.* The archbishop, or metropolitan, was empowered, by the laws, to summon the suffragan bishops of his province; to revise their conduct, to vindicate their rights, to declare their faith, and to examine the merit of the candidates who were elected by the clergy and people to supply the vacancies of the episcopal college. The primates of Rome, Alexandria, Antioch, Carthage, and afterwards Constantinople, who exercised a more ample jurisdiction, convened the numerous assembly of their dependent bishops. But the convention of great and extraordinary synods was the prerogative of the emperor alone. Whenever the emergencies of the church required this decisive measure, he dispatched a precatory summons to the bishops, or the deputies of each province, with an order for the use of post-horarii, and a competent allowance for the expences of their journey. At an early period, when Constantine was the protector, rather than the proselyte of christianity, he referred the African controversy to the council of Arles; in which the bishops of York, of Treves, of Milan, and of

* The council of Nice, in the fourth century, which, and several, to-morrow, but which were fundamental regulations concerning episcopate, metropolitans, and jurisdiction. The Nicene canon have been variously corrupted, altered, interpolated, or forged, according to the interest of the clergy. The Eastern churches, assigned by Rufinus to the bishop of Rome, have been made the subject of violent controversy. See Reformed Opera, tom. iv, p. 1-53.

CHAP.

XX

c. x. 313.

Carthage, met his friends and brethren, to debate, in their native tongue, on the common interest of the Latin or Western church.* Eleven years afterwards, a more numerous and celebrated assembly was convened at Nice in Bithynia, to extinguish, by their final sentence, the subtle disputes which had arisen in Egypt on the subject of the Trinity. Three hundred and eighteen bishops obeyed the summons of their indulgent master; the ecclesiastics of every rank, and sect, and denominations, have been computed at two thousand and forty-eight persons;† the Greeks appeared in person; and the consent of the Latins was expressed by the legates of the Roman pontiff. The session, which lasted about two months, was frequently honoured by the presence of the emperor. Leaving his guards at the door, he seated himself (with the permission of the council) on a low stool in the midst of the hall. Constantine listened with patience, and spoke with modesty; and while he influenced the debates, he humbly professed that he was the minister, not the judge, of the successors of the apostles, who had been established as priests and as gods upon earth.‡ Such profound reverence of an absolute

* We have only descriptions of two great synodal assemblies. But Asia, in ancient times, of small assembly, contains six hundred bishops in the council of Asia. Tillemont Mém. Ecclési. tom. vi. p. 473.

† See Tillemont, Ann. vi. p. 315. and Événement Hist. de Macédoine, tom. i. p. 379. The name of bishop, which is given by Eusebius to the 318 authorities (Annal. tom. i. p. 412, infra Passer), must be corrected far beyond the limit of an orthodox or pure episcopal assembly.

‡ See Épist. to Six. Constant. l. 42. c. 5-21; Tillemont Mém. Ecclesiastiques, tom. vi. p. 622-333.

monarch towards a feeble and unarmed assembly of his own subjects, can only be compared to the respect with which the senate had been treated by the Roman princes who adopted the policy of Augustus. Within the space of fifty years, a philosophic spectator of the vicissitudes of human affairs, might have contemplated Tacitus in the senate of Rome, and Constantine in the council of Nice. The fathers of the capital, and those of the church, had alike degenerated from the virtues of their founders; but as the bishops were more deeply rooted in the public opinion, they sustained their dignity with more decent pride, and sometimes opposed, with a manly spirit, the wishes of their sovereign. The progress of time and superstition, erased the memory of the weakness, the passion, the ignorance, which disgraced these ecclesiastical synods; and the catholic world has unanimously submitted to the infallible decrees of the general councils.*

* Sanctissimus spiritus vobis legimus, quod a synodo apostolica constitutum, . . . expresse vult nos servare. Traditiones vero antiquas synodorum, dogmata, etiam scriptura scripturas et regulas sancti scripturae observant. Justinian. Novell. cxxxix. Drivallus (de Paderb., locus p. 177) remarks, that the emperor never made use here of ecclesiastical authority; and Constantine likewise, in a very different spirit, that they gave a legal sanction to the decrees of councils. See the Code de Napoli, tom. 1. p. 180.

* See the article Councils in the Encyclopædia; tom. III. p. 684. FIV. edition de L'Encyclopædie. The author, M. le Docteur Bénédict, has discussed, according to the principles of the Catholic church, the principal questions which relate to the birth and constitution of general, national, and provincial councils. The editor (de Fontenay) is very benevolent to be proud of the article. There also, especially their immense compilation, edition de Paris et de la Haye.

CHAP. XXI.

*Persecution of heresy—The schism of the Donatists—
The Arian controversy—Athanasius—Distracted state of the church and empire under Constantine and his sons.—Toleration of paganism.*

CHAP.
XXI.

THE grateful applause of the clergy has consecrated the memory of a prince who indulged their passions and promoted their interest. Constantine gave them security, wealth, honours, and revenge; and the support of the orthodox faith was considered as the most sacred and important duty of the civil magistrate. The edict of Milan, the great charter of toleration, had confirmed to each individual of the Roman world, the privilege of choosing and professing his own religion. But this inestimable privilege was soon violated; with the knowledge of truth the emperor imbibed the maxims of persecution; and the sects which dissented from the catholic church, were afflicted and oppressed by the triumph of christianity. Constantine easily believed that the heretics, who presumed to dispute his opinions, or to oppose his commands, were guilty of the most absurd and criminal obstinacy; and that a reasonable application of moderate severities might save those unhappy men from the danger of an everlasting condemnation. Not a moment was lost in excommunicating the ministers and teachers of the separated congregations from any share of the rewards and immunities which the emperor had so liberally bestowed on the orthodox clergy. But as the sectaries might still exist under the cloud of royal disgrace, the conquest of the East was immediately followed by an edict which announced their total destruction.* After a preamble, filled with passion and reproach, Constantine absolutely prohibits the assemblies of the heretics, and confiscates their public property to the use either of the revenue or of the catholic church. The sects against whom the imperial severity was directed, appear to have been the adherents of Paul of Samosata; the montanists of Phrygia, who maintained an enthusiastic succession of prophecy; the novatians, who sternly rejected the temporal efficacy of repentance; the marcionites and valentinians, under whose leading banners the various gnostics of Asia and Egypt had insensibly rallied; and perhaps the manichæans, who had recently imported from Persia a more artificial composition of oriental and christian theology.† The design of extirpating the name, or at least of restraining the progress, of these odious heretics, was prosecuted with vigour and effect. Some of the penal regulations were copied from the edicts of Diocletian; and this method of conversion was applauded

* Philippus in Vit. Constantia. l. 34, c. 63, 64, 65, ed.

† After some examination of the various systems of Tillmanns, Neumann, Lathier, &c. I am convinced that Manis did not propagate this sect, even in Persia, before the year 779. It is strange, that a philosopher and sage, whose name should have penetrated to the remotest parts of the African provinces; yet I cannot easily reject the guilt of Diocletian against the manichæans, which may be found in Baronius. Annal. Eccl. s. 2. 1847.

CHAP. by the same bishops who had felt the hand of op-XXX pressions, and had pleaded for the rights of humanity. Two immaterial circumstances may serve, however, to prove that the mind of Constantine was not entirely corrupted by the spirit of zeal and bigotry. Before he condemned the monks, and their kindred sects, he resolved to make an accurate inquiry into the nature of their religious principles. As if he distrusted the impartiality of his ecclesiastical counsellors, this delicate commission was entrusted to a civil magistrate, whose learning and moderation he justly esteemed, and of whose venal character he was probably ignorant.* The emperor was soon convinced, that he had too hastily proscribed the orthodox faith and the exemplary morals of the novatians, who had dissented from the church in some articles of discipline which were not perhaps essential to salvation. By a particular edict, he exempted them from the general penalties of the law;† allowed them to build a church at Constantinople, respected the miracles of their saints, invited their bishop Aresius to the council of Nice; and gently ridiculed the narrow tenets of his sect by a familiar jest; which, from the mouth of a sovereign, must have been received with applause and gratitude." CHAP. XL.

* Constantine, who was himself superstitious, possessed a native, unobscured sense of justice, and, as a monarch, he was sensible, that the emperor of Rome, who from this commission obtained the surname of Magnificent, was a champion of the Arrian sect. He acted on one of the points at the council of Nice. Liberius placed his soldiers and prefects Valer at Levon Armenia.

† God. Thes. i. vol. iii. s. 2, sup. 2. As the general law is not inserted in the Theodosian code, it is probable, that in the year 438. The sect which it had condemned were already extinct.

The complaints and mutual accusations which assailed the throne of Constantine, as soon as the death of Maxentius had submitted Africa to his victorious arms, were ill adapted to edify an imperfect proselyte. He learned with surprise, that the provinces of that great country, from the confines of Cyrene to the columns of Hercules, were distracted with religious discord.^a The source of the division was derived from a double election in the church of Carthage; the second, in rank and opulence, of the ecclesiastical thrones of the West. Cæcilian and Majorinus were the two rival primates of Africa; and the death of the latter soon made room for Donatus, who, by his superior abilities and apparent virtues, was the firmest support of his party. The advantage which Cæcilian might claim from the priority of his ordination, was destroyed by the illegal, or at least indecent, haste, with which it had been performed, without expecting the arrival of the controversy,

African
p. 312.

^a Seebeck, l. 4, c. 22; Suetonius, l. 4, c. 13. These witnesses have been appealed to, but I think without reason, of an attachment to the heretical doctrine. The emperor said to the bishops, "I desire you, like a father, and not as he feared by yourself." Most of the churches were then, by name, devoted to the faith of Aurelius.

^b The best materials for this part of ecclesiastical history may be found in the edition of Optatus Milevitanus, published (Trevi, 1769) by M. Dupin, who has enriched it with almost every geographical description, original records, and an accurate statement of the whole controversy. M. de Tillemont has borrowed on this subject the greatest part of a volume from vi, part 6; and I am inclined to look for an ample collection of all the passages of his interest in Augustine, which relate to these matters.

bishops of Numidia. The authority of those bishops, who, to the number of seventy, condemned Cæcilian, and consecrated Majorinus, is again weakened by the infamy of some of their personal characters; and by the female intrigues, sacrilegious bargains, and tumultuous proceedings, which are imputed to this Numidian council.^a The bishops of the contending factions maintained, with equal ardour and obstinacy, that their adversaries were degraded, or at least dishonoured by the odious crime of delivering the holy scriptures to the officers of Diocletian. From their mutual reproaches, as well as from the story of this dark transaction, it may justly be inferred that the late persecution had smothered the zeal, without reforming the manners, of the African christians. That divided church was incapable of affording an impartial judgment; the controversy was solemnly tried in five successive tribunals, which were appointed by the emperor; and the whole proceedings, from the first appeal to the final sentence, lasted above three years. A severe inquisition, which was taken by the prætorian vicar, and the præconsul of Africa, the report of two episcopal visitors who had been sent

^a Schisme (sic) de l'empire confuso, contacts innumérables, papauté, emulsi universis, apostata universis. Optatus, l. i, c. 15. The language of Optatus is that of a furious maligant. Thucyd. 2, 65, 2. Alia parva sunt dona. Purpureæ vestimenta, Purpureæ vestimenta & c. ... vestimenta, et vestimenta, et qui vestimenta, et vestimenta. Acta Concilii Carthaginiensis, 400. Optat. p. 128. When Cæcilian was accused in an assembly of bishops, Optatus said to his brethren, as rather as his strength. "Let him come before to receive our judgement of 70 hands; and we will break his head by way of justice." Optat. l. i, c. 15.

To Carthage, the decrees of the councils of Nîme and of Arles, and the supreme judgment of Constantine himself in his sacred consistory, were all favourable to the cause of Cæcilian; and he was unanimously acknowledged by the civil and ecclesiastical powers, as the true and lawful primate of Africa. The honours and estates of the church were attributed to his suffragan bishops; and it was not without difficulty, that Constantine was satisfied with inflicting the punishment of exile on the principal leaders of the donatist faction. As their cause was examined with attention, perhaps it was determined with justice. Perhaps their complaint was not without foundation, that the credulity of the emperor had been abused by the insidious arts of his favourite Osius. The influence of falsehood and corruption might procure the condemnation of the innocent, or aggravate the sentence of the guilty. Such an act, however, of injustice, if it concluded an importunate dispute, might be numbered among the transient evils of a despotic administration, which are neither felt nor remembered by posterity.

But this incident, so inconsiderable that it scarcely deserves a place in history, was productive of a memorable schism, which afflicted the provinces of Africa above three hundred years, and was extinguished only with christianity itself. The inflexible zeal of freedom and fanaticism animated the donatists to refuse obedience to the usurpers, whose election they disputed, and whose spiritual powers they denied. Excluded from the civil and religious communion of mankind,

Schism of the donatists, c. 312.

THAT they boldly excommunicated the rest of mankind
 XXI. who had embraced the impious party of Cæcilian, and of the traitors, from whom he derived his pretended ordination. They asserted with confidence, and almost with exultation, that the apostolical succession was interrupted; that all the bishops of Europe and Asia were infected by the contagion of guilt and schism; and that the prerogatives of the catholic church were confined to the chosen portion of the African believers, who alone had preserved inviolate the integrity of their faith and discipline. This rigid theory was supported by the most uncharitable conduct.
 Whenever they acquired a proselyte, even from the distant provinces of the East, they carefully repeated the sacred rites of baptism* and ordination; as they rejected the validity of those which he had already received from the hands of heretics or schismatics. Bishops, virgins, and even spotless infants, were subjected to the disgrace of a public penance, before they could be admitted to the communion of the donatists. If they obtained possession of a church which had been used by their catholic adversaries, they purified the unhallowed building with the same jealous care which a temple of idols might have required.
 They washed the pavement, scraped the walls,

* The councils of Arles, of Nice, and of Ypres, confirmed the rule and discipline of the church of Rome. The donatists however, had the advantage of maintaining the sentence of Cyprian, and of a considerable part of the primitive church. Vincentius Lirin-ensis to EPI. ep. Tillmann, Mon. Ecclæ. tom. vi. p. 129 has explained why the donatists are eternally burning with the devil, while St. Cyprian reigns in heaven with Jesus Christ.

but at the altar, which was commonly of wood, unveiled the consecrated plate, and cast the holy eucharist to the dogs, with every circumstance of ignominy which could provoke and perpetuate the animosity of religious factions.¹ Notwithstanding this irreconcilable aversion, the two parties, who were mixed and separated in all the cities of Africa, had the same language and manners, the same zeal and learning, the same faith and worship. Prescribed by the civil and ecclesiastical powers of the empire, the donatists still maintained in some provinces, particularly in Numidia, their superior numbers; and five hundred bishops acknowledged the jurisdiction of their primate. But the invincible spirit of the sect sometimes preyed on its own vitals; and the bosom of their schismatical church was torn by intestine divisions. A fourth part of the donatist bishops followed the independent standard of the maximinists. The narrow and solitary path which their first leaders had marked out, continued to deviate from the great society of mankind. Even the imperceptible sect of the rogations could affirm, without a blush, that when Christ should descend to judge the earth, he would find his true religion preserved only in a few nameless villages of the Cæsarean Mauritania.²

¹ See the sixth book of Optatus Novatianus, p. 164. 165.

² Tillemont, Mém. Ecclesiastiques, tom. ix, part 1, p. 214. He thought that party worthy. Of reverend Augustin, the great doctor of the system of persecution.

CHAP.
XXI.

The trinitarian controversy.

The schism of the donatists was confined to Africa: the more diffusive mischief of the trinitarian controversy successively penetrated into every part of the christian world. The former was an accidental quarrel, occasioned by the abuse of freedom: the latter was a high and mysterious argument, derived from the abuse of philosophy. From the age of Constantine to that of Clovis and Theodoric, the temporal interests both of the Romans and barbarians were deeply involved in the theological disputes of ariminus. The historian may therefore be permitted respectfully to withdraw the veil of the sanctuary: and to deduce the progress of reason and faith, of error and passion, from the school of Plato to the decline and fall of the empire.

The system of Plato before Christ 300.

The genius of Plato, informed by his own meditation, or by the traditional knowledge of the priests of Egypt,¹ had ventured to explore the mysterious nature of the deity. When he had elevated his mind to the sublime contemplation of the first self-existent, necessary cause of the universe, the Athenian sage was incapable of conceiving how the simple unity of his essence could admit the infinite variety of distinct and successive ideas which compose the model of the intellectual world; how a being purely incorporeal could execute that perfect model, and mould with a plastic hand the rude and independent chaos. The vain hope of extricating himself from these difficulties, which must ever oppress the feeble powers of the human mind, might induce Plato to consider the divine nature under the threefold modification; of the first cause, the reason or logos, and the soul or spirit of the universe. The logos His poetical imagination sometimes fixed and animated these metaphysical abstractions; the three archai or original principles were represented in the platonic system as three gods, united with each other by a mysterious and ineffable generation; and the logos was particularly considered under the more accessible character of the son of an eternal father, and the creator and governor of the world. Such appear to have been the secret doctrines which were cautiously whispered in the gardens of the academy; and which, according to the more recent disciples of Plato, could not be perfectly understood, till after an assiduous study of thirty years.²

¹ First Egyptian paragraph of a sacerdotal letter is concerned in religious allegory. Comment de Platon, c. 21. The Egyptians, who still preserve the traditional creed of the pyramids. Josephus has borrowed many of the christian fathers, that they derived a part of his knowledge from the Jews; but this same opinion cannot be reconciled with the constant union and mutual presence of the Egyptian people, whose religious were not admitted to Greek society till more than one thousand years after the death of Plato. See Maximian, Comment. Clem. p. 114. Id. Clem. Epistol. ad Alex. lib. p. 137a. 138.

The arms of the Macedonians diffused over ^{the whole of} Asia and Egypt the language and learning of ^{the school of} Alex.

* The evidence gathered who lead me to the knowledge of the plain truth against you, Outhurst (Confidential Source, p. 100-1001); Managers (Conf. de Julia, A. 14, v. 14, p. 12-1001); Le Chem. (Conf. 101, 101, p. 104-1001); and Brother (Conf. 101, 101, p. 101-1001). At the hearing of these women was equal, and their behavior different, in testimony, however they desire indication from their divorce, and custody from their movement.

CHAP. XXXI. Greece; and the theological system of Plato was taught with less reserve, and perhaps with some improvements, in the celebrated school of Alexandria.* A numerous colony of Jews had been invited, by the favour of the Ptolemies, to settle in their new capital.[†] While the bulk of the nation practised the legal ceremonies, and pursued the lucrative occupations of commerce, a few Hebrews, of a more liberal spirit, devoted their lives to religious and philosophical contemplation.[‡] They cultivated with diligence, and embraced with ardour, the theological system of the Athenian sage. But their national pride would have been mortified by a fair confession of their former poverty: and they boldly marked, as the sacred inheritance of their ancestors, the gold and jewels which they had so lately stolen from their Egyptian masters. One hundred years before the birth of Christ, a philosophical treatise, which manifestly betrays the style and sentiments of the school of Plato, was produced by the Alexandrian Jews, and unanimously received as a genuine and valuable relic of the inspired wisdom of Solomon.[§] A similar union of the mosaic faith, and

Before
Christ 100.

* Brucker, Hist. Philosoph. tom. 1, p. 1249-1251. The Alexandrian school is celebrated by Strabo (l. 17) and Ammianus (l. 25, c. 6).

† Joseph. Antiquit. l. 11, c. 3. Jelly's Geography, Hist. des Juifs, t. 10, p. 7.

‡ For the origin of the Jewish philosophy, see Emenius, Preparat. Evangel. vol. 2, l. 10. According to Philo, the Therozoitic studied philosophy; and Boetius has joined this Philosophy (tom. 2, p. 255) that they gave the preference to that of Plato.

§ See Calzed, Dissertation sur le Bible, tom. 1, p. 577. The book of the Wisdom of Solomon was received by many of the fathers

the Grecian philosophy, distinguishes the works of Philo, which were composed, for the most part, under the reign of Augustus.* The material soul of the universe† might offend the piety of the Hebrews: but they applied the character of the logos to the Jehovah of Moses and the patriarchs; and the son of God was introduced upon earth under a visible, and even human appearance, to perform those familiar offices which seem incompatible with the nature and attributes of the universal cause.‡

The eloquence of Plato, the name of Solomon, the authority of the school of Alexandria; and the CHAR.

XXI.

Revealed by the apostle
St. John,
i. c. 31.

as the work of that century: and although rejected by the protestants for want of a Hebrew original, it has obtained, with the rest of the Vulgate, the sanction of the council of Trent.

* The pleroma of Philo, which was famous to a proverb, is proved beyond a doubt by Le Clerc (Opus. Crit. viii. p. 211-229). Baumgarten (Hist. nov. Test. i. 12. c. 39) has clearly maintained, that the theological works of Philo were composed before the death, and were probably before the burning of the temple. In such a time of darkness, the knowledge of Philo is even as valuable as the logos. Bibl. Critica. Vol. Nov. i. c. 2, p. 12.

† Many ignorant nations, as heathens or corrupt Jews. Besides this material soul, Godworth has discovered (p. 527), in Amelius, Porphyry, Plotinus, and, as he thinks, in Plato himself, a superior, spiritual, representative soul of the universe. But this doctrine was exploded by Brucker, Baumgarten, and Le Clerc, as an idle story of the later platonists.

‡ Pagan Deogens Theologiae, tom. ii. l. vii. c. 2, p. 791. Bibl. Defens. Vol. Nov. i. c. 1, p. 8-12. This notion, but it was shared by the atoms, was easily adopted in the christian theology. Tertullian (Adv. Praxean. c. 16) has a remarkable and dangerous passage. After considering, with ill-directed will, the nature of God, and the nature of Jehovah, he concludes: Sicilicet si hoc de illo non credideris, falsum, et non scripta veritas; scilicet non credideris de patre filium esse.

CHAP.
XX.

current of the Jews and Greeks, were insufficient to establish the truth of a mysterious doctrine, which might please, but could not satisfy, a rational mind. A prophet, or apostle, inspired by the deity, can alone exercise a lawful dominion over the faith of mankind: and the theology of Plato might have been for ever confounded with the philosophical fictions of the academy, the porch, and the lyceum, if the name and divine attributes of the logos had not been confirmed by the celestial pen of the last and most sublime of the evangelists.* The christian revelation, which was consummated under the reign of Nerva, disclosed to the world the amazing secret, that the logos, who was with God from the beginning, and was God, who had made all things, and for whom all things had been made, was incarnate in the person of Jesus of Nazareth; who had been born of a virgin, and suffered death on the cross. Besides the general design of fixing on a perpetual basis the divine honours of Christ, the most ancient and respectable of the ecclesiastical writers have ascribed to the evangelic theologian, a particular intention to confute two opposite heresies, which disturbed the peace of the primitive church.†

* The platonists admired the beginning of the gospel of St. John, as containing an exact transcript of their own principles. Augustin, de Civitate Dei, v. 22. Amelinus apud Cyril. adversus Julian. l. viii. p. 287. But in the third and fourth centuries, the platonists of Alexandria might improve their study, by the more exact study of the Christian theology.

† See Theodoret, Hist. Ecclesiastice ad Machabios, tom. i. p. 277. The gospel according to St. John is supposed to have been published about seventy years after the death of Christ.

1. The faith of the ebionites,¹ perhaps of the CHAE.
nazarenes,² was gross and imperfect. They ^{XXI} revered Jesus as the greatest of the prophets, <sup>The ebionites and Nazarenes.</sup>
 endowed with supernatural virtue and power.
 They ascribed to his person and to his future reign all the predictions of the Hebrew oracles which relate to the spiritual and everlasting kingdom of the promised Messiah.* Some of them might confess that he was born of a virgin: but they obstinately rejected the preceding existence and divine perfections of the logos, or son of God, which are so clearly defined in the gospel of St.
 John. About fifty years afterwards, the ebionites, whose errors are mentioned by Justin Martyr with less severity than they seem to deserve,³ formed a very inconsiderable portion of the christian name.
 2. The gnostics, who were distinguished by the epithet of doctores, deviated into the contrary extreme; and betrayed the human, while they

¹ The sectarians of the ebionites are fully named by Marcion (p. 233) and La Croye (Hist. Eccl. p. 232). The ebionites, published among the apostolical fathers, are considered by the critics to be out of these parties.

² Strabo's testimony, like Basil Gildensis (Eccl. Collect. v. 7), rests on the authority of the annuaries which appear too late and certain in the eyes of Marcion (p. 232).

³ The Jewish traditions and writings of Jesus have always been a stumbling block to the Jews. "Quod... perinde est obiculus." "Mithras deprehenus: interpresque... judicis, pueri," &c. See Lactantius et Origenis Antea Colla. p. 8-17, 22-24, 102-103. But this objection has changed the believing Christians to 200 or 300 years to a spiritual and everlasting kingdom.

⁴ Justin Martyr, Hist. ante Tertullianum, p. 127, 244. See La Croye, Hist. Eccl. p. 232. Basil, and his other Greek Fathers (Eccl. Collect. v. 7) and apostolical fathers, to dissent from the authorities of the apostles and fathers: but their violent assertions of the fact is rejected even by the benedictine edition.

CHAP. asserted the divine nature of Christ. Educated XXI. in the school of Plato, accustomed to the sublime idea of the logos, they readily conceived that the brightest æon, or emanation of the deity, might assume the outward shape and visible appearances of a mortal; but they vainly pretended that the imperfections of matter are incompatible with the purity of a celestial substance. While the blood of Christ yet smoked on mount Calvary, the divines invented the impious and extravagant hypothesis, that instead of issuing from the womb of the virgin,* he had descended on the banks of the Jordan in the form of perfect manhood;
 that he had imposed on the senses of his enemies, and of his disciples; and that the ministers of Pilate had wasted their impotent rage on an airy phantom, who seemed to expire on the cross, and,
 after three days to rise from the dead.

Mysterious The divine sanction, which the apostle had history of bestowed on the fundamental principle of the the Trinity.

* The writers reproached the orthodox party with borrowing their Trinity from the idolatrous and marriage. See Revue des deux Mondes, t. 11, p. 361.

* Non dignum est ut mare reddere Deum, at Deus Christus
 . . . non dignum sit ut tanta majestas per maria et equales mollescit, in mare rediret. The gentiles asserted the impurity of matter, and of marriage; and they were scandalized by the gross superstitions of the fathers, and even of Augustine himself. See Revue des deux M., p. 373.

* Apostolic fathers in sacred superstitions spent Juliana Gerson negative words, of phantasmal corpus. Eusebius ecclesiasticus, Con- stantinus thinks (Peters Apostol. tom. II, p. 24) that those who maintained the doctrine to have arisen in the form of the apostles, very willingly would deny that the sun shone a noon day. These Gerson, who formed the most moderate party among the gentiles, were segalized, because they granted only a seeming body to Christ.

theology of Plato, encouraged the learned prototypes of the second and third centuries to admire and study the writings of the Athenian sage, who had thus marvellously anticipated one of the most surprising discoveries of the christian revelation. The respectable name of Plato was used by the orthodox,¹ and abused by the heretics,² as the common support of truth and error: the authority of his skillful commentators, and the science of dialects, were employed to justify the remote consequences of his opinions, and to supply the discreet silence of the inspired writers. The same subtle and profound questions, concerning the nature, the generation, the distinction, and the equality of the three divine persons of the mysterious Faith, or Trinity,³ were agitated in the philosophical, and in the christian schools, of Alexandria. An eager spirit of curiosity urged

¹ Some proofs of the respect which the christian writers paid for the genius and doctrine of Plato, may be found in De la Motte Le Vayer, tom. 2, p. 122, &c. with 1137; and Bollandus, Acta de Synodo, tom. 2, p. 29, 30, &c.

² Julius Justin Edit, Platonis contra hereticorum exotericarum sectarum Thesaurus, de Antiqua, c. 22. Petaurus (Deop. Theolog. tom. 3, p. 104, &c.) shows that this was a general complaint. Bollandus (tom. 1, l. 3, c. 5, 10), has declared the Gnostic errors flow from platonic principles; and so, in the school of Alexandria, those principles were blended with the elements of philosophy (Bollandus, tom. 1, p. 124), the sentiment of Bollandus may be compared with the opinion of Mehus (General History of the Church, vol. 1, p. 31).

³ If Theophilus, bishop of Antioch, and Daput, Metropolitans of Iconopolis, tom. 1, p. 84, was the first who employed the word Faith, Trinity, that ancient term, which was already familiar to the schools of philosophy, must have been introduced into the theology of the christians after the middle of the second century.

CHAP.
XXI.

them to explore the secrets of the abyss; and the pride of the professors, and of their disciples, was satisfied with the science of words. But this most sagacious of the christian theologians, the great Athanasius himself, has candidly confessed, that whenever he forced his understanding to meditate on the divinity of the logos, his vain and unavailing efforts recoiled on themselves; that the more he thought, the less he comprehended; and the more he wrote, the less capable was he of expressing his thoughts. In every step of the inquiry, we are compelled to feel and acknowledge the immeasurable disproportion between the size of the object and the capacity of the human mind. We may strive to abstract the notions of time, of space, and of matter, which so closely adhere to all the perceptions of our experimental knowledge; but as soon as we presume to reason of infinite substance, of spiritual generation; as often as we deduce any positive conclusions from a negative idea, we are involved in darkness, perplexity, and inevitable contradiction. As these difficulties arise from the nature of the subject, they appear, with the same insuperable weight, the philosophic and the theological disputant; but we may observe two essential and peculiar circumstances, which discriminated the doctrines of the catholic church from the opinions of the platonic school.

End of the Institution

1. A chosen society of philosophers, men of a liberal education and various disposition, might

* Athanasius, opus v. p. 106. His expressions here on reasoning suggest, and as he here writes in Greek, there could not be any occasion for him to effect a national language.

silently meditates, and temperately discuss, in the CHAP.
XVI
gardens of Athens, or the library of Alexandria, the abstract questions of metaphysical science. The hasty speculations, which neither convinced the understanding, nor agitated the passions, of the platonists themselves, were scarcely overlooked by the idle, the busy, and even the studious part of mankind.² But after the logos had been revealed as the sacred object of the faith, the hope, and the religious worship of the christians, the mysterious system was embraced by an numerous and increasing multitude in every province of the Roman world. Those persons who, from their age, or sex, or occupations, were the least qualified to judge, who were the least exercised in the habits of abstract reasoning, aspired to contemplate the economy of the Divine Nature; and it is the boast of Tertullian,³ that a christian mechanic could readily answer such questions as had perplexed the wisest of the Grecian sages. Where the subject lies so far beyond our reach, the difference between the highest and the lowest of human understandings may indeed be calculated as infinitely small; yet the degree of weakness may perhaps be measured by the degree of obstinacy and dogmatic confidence. These specula-

² In a treatise, written purposed to explain the opinions of the ancient philosophers concerning the nature of the gods, we might expect to discover the theological system of Plato. But Cicero very justly remarks, that though he had translated the Timæus, he could never understand what mythos or calypso. See Hieronymus ad l. i. ill. in Isidorum, tom. v. p. 134.

³ Tertullian de Agenda c. 16. See Boyle, Dissertation on poet Science. The remarks on the presumption of Tertullian are profound and interesting.

CHAP.
XXI.

things, instead of being treated as the amusement of a vacant hour, became themselves serious business of the present, and the most useful preparation for a future life. A theology, which it was incumbent to believe, which it was impious to doubt, and which it might be dangerous, and even fatal, to mistake, became the familiar topic of private meditation and popular discourse. The cold indifference of philosophy was inflamed by the fervent spirit of devotion; and even the metaphors of common language suggested the fallacious prejudices of sense and experience. The christians, who abhorred the gross and impure generation of the Greek mythology,* were tempted to argue from the familiar analogy of the filial and paternal relations. The character of Son seemed to imply a perpetual subordination of the voluntary author of his existence;† but as the act of generation, in the most spiritual and abstracted sense, must be supposed to transmit the properties of a common nature,‡ they durst not presume to circumscribe

* Lactantius, iv. 2. Yet the Phœbe or Proserpine, which the most ardent disciples borrowed without scruple from the Venerabunda, and illustrated by the comparison of a familiar and common, the sun and his rays, did not seem to signify, or to convey a material idea of the divine generation. See Bunsenius, tom. 2. l. 16. c. 7, p. 248.

† Many of the primitive writers have frankly confessed, that the Son owed his being to the will of the Father. See Cassel's Confutation Trinity, p. 261-265. On the other hand, Athanasius and his followers were unwilling to grant what they are afraid to deny. The scholastic theologians themselves have this difficulty by the distinction of a preceding and a concurrent will. Fauri, Disquis. Theolog. tom. 2. l. 1. c. 2, p. 287-293.

‡ See Præf. Disquis. Theolog. tom. 2. l. 11. c. 10, p. 128.

the powers or the duration of the son of an eternal and omnipotent father. Four score years after the death of Christ, the christians of Bithynia declared, before the tribunal of Pliny, that they invoked him as a god; and his divine honours have been perpetuated in every age and country, by the various sects who assume the name of his disciples.* Their tender reverence for the memory of Christ, and their horror for the profane worship of any created being, would have engaged them to assert the equal and absolute divinity of the logos, if their rapid ascent towards the throne of heaven had not been imperceptibly checked by the apprehension of violating the unity and sole supremacy of the great Father of Christ and of the universe. The suspense and fluctuation produced in the minds of the christians, by these opposite tendencies, may be observed in the writings of the theologians who flourished after the end of the apostolic age, and before the origin of the Arian controversy. Their suffrage is claimed, with equal confidence, by the orthodox and by the heretical parties; and the most inquisitive critics have fairly allowed, that if they had the good fortune of possessing the catholic verity, they have delivered their conceptions in loose,

* Contra gentes Christus quid non dixerit, secuti latentes. Plin. Epist. x. 97. The sense of Deus, dominus, filius, in the ancient languages, is ably and judiciously examined by Le Clerc des Origines, p. 130-140, and the propriety of worshipping a very exalted creature is ably defended by the Encyclopædia (Trévoux, p. 28-30, 81-144).

CHAP. LXXXI. impartial, and sometimes contradictory, language.

Account
of the church.

11. The devotion of individuals was the first circumstance which distinguished the christians from the platonists; the second was the authority of the church. The disciples of philosophy asserted the rights of intellectual freedom, and their respect for the sentiments of their teachers was a liberal and voluntary tribute, which they offered to superior reason. But the christians formed a numerous and disciplined society, and the jurisdiction of their laws and magistrates was strictly exercised over the minds of the faithful. The loose wanderings of the imagination were gradually confined by creeds and confessions; the freedom of private judgment submitted to the public wisdom of synods; the authority of a theologian was determined by his ecclesiastical rank; and the episcopal successors of the apostles inflicted the censures of the church on those who deviated from the orthodox belief. But in an age of religious controversy, every act of oppression adds new force to the elastic vigour of the mind; and the zeal or obstinacy of a spiritual rebel was sometimes stimulated by secret motives of ambition or

* See Edell & Van Pelt, and Le Cœur. Hilsholm, university, tom. x. p. 409. To assign the birth of the Katholicon doctrine was the object, or at least has been the effect, of the expensive work of Frederick in the Trinity. Thompson, tom. II, and for the deep impression here caused by the learned defence of Edell Hall.

† The same ancient minds were spent up with the greatest latitude. See Hall, Education. London, Edell, etc. tom. 10, printed Episcopate from deterring any advantage from this observation.

avarice. A metaphysical argument became the cause or pretence of political contests; the subtleties of the platonic school were used as the badges of popular factions, and the distance which separated their respective tenets was enlarged and magnified by the animosity of dispute. As long as the dark heresies of Praxeas and Sabellius laboured to confound the Father with the Son,^a the orthodox party might be excused if they adhered more strictly and more earnestly to the distinction, than to the equality, of the divine persons. But as soon as the heat of controversy had subsided, and the progress of the Sabellians was no longer an object of terror to the churches of Rome, of Africa, or of Egypt, the tide of theological opinion began to flow with a gentle but steady motion toward the contrary extreme; and the most orthodox doctors allowed themselves the use of the terms and definitions which had been employed in the mouth of the sectaries.^b After the edict of toleration had restored peace and leisure to the churches, the trinitarian controversy was revived in the ancient seat of platonism, the learned, the opulent, the tumultuous city of Alexandria; and the flames of religious discord were rapidly communicated from the schools to the clergy, the people, the pro-

^a The heresies of Praxeas, Sabellius, &c. are minutely explained by Huetius (p. 425, 480, 718). Praxeas, who seems to have lived about the end of the second century, declared, for other titles, the equality of the Father, and was confuted by the pen of the angry Tertullian.

^b Eusebius witnesses, that the heresy of Arius prevailed first; his strong dislike to heretics is evident; the most diametrically opposite to that of Sabellius.

vince, and the East. The alarum question of the eternity of the logos was agitated in ecclesiastical conferences, and popular sermons; and the heterodox opinions of Arius* were soon made public by his own zeal, and by that of his adversaries. His most implacable adversaries have acknowledged the learning and blameless life of that eminent presbyter, who, in a former election, had declared, and perhaps generously declined, his pretensions to the episcopal throne.† His competitor, Alexander, assumed the office of his judge. The important cause was argued before him; and if at first he seemed to hesitate, he at length pronounced his final sentence, as an absolute rule of faith.‡ The undaunted presbyter, who presumed to resist the authority of his angry bishop, was separated from the communion of the church; but the pride of Arius was supported by the applause of a numerous party. He reckoned among his immediate followers two bishops of

* The dogma and doctrine of Arius, the character and numbers of his first followers, are related in very lively colours by Epiphanius (tom. i. Hæres. lib. 2. p. 119.) and we cannot but regret that he should ever forget the distinction, to mention the rank of controversy.

† See Polikarpus (l. i. c. 2.) and Gelasius's scripta Communis. Yet the credulity of Polikarpus is incorrect, in the eyes of the orthodox; by his admission, and in those of rational critics by his partiality, his prejudice, and his ignorance.

‡ Zonaras (l. i. c. 13) represents Alexander as indifferent, and even ignorant, in the beginning of the controversy; while Eusebius (l. i. c. 2) ascribes the origin of the dispute to the vain vanity of his theological speculations. M. Leves Chénier in Éclaircissement Historique, vol. iv. p. 118 has observed, with his usual freedom, the conduct of Alexander: et d'après ces faits . . . nous pouvons

Egypt, seven presbyters, twelve deacons, and (what may appear almost incredible) seven hundred virgins. A large majority of the bishops of Asia appeared to support or favour his cause; and their measures were conducted by Eusebius of Cæsarea, the most learned of the christian prelates; and by Eusebius of Nicomedia, who had acquired the reputation of a statesman without forfeiting that of a saint. Synods in Palestine and Bithynia were opposed to the synods of Egypt. The attention of the prince and people was attracted by this theological dispute; and the decision, at the end of six years,* was referred to the supreme authority of the general council of Nice. + A. 318-222.

When the mysteries of the christian faith were dangerously exposed to public debate, it might be observed, that the human understanding was capable of forming three distinct, though imperfect, systems, concerning the nature of the divine trinity; and it was pronounced, that none of these systems, in a pure and absolute sense, were exempt from heresy and error.^a 1. According Three systems of the trinity. to the first hypothesis, which was maintained by Arius and his disciples, the logos was a depend-

* The Dates of attention might have the same time in account, but there is reason to believe that they have not with respect to every at the year 310. Tillemont, Mem. Eccles. tom. iv. p. 354-360.

^a Quod credendum est: Certe, aut non credendum credendum non Deum esse credidit, et credendum credendum non; et in illis veritate transmissis credendum Deum, in illis illud credendum credendum; et credendum in illis credendum non Deum credendum, illud in illis credendum credendum credendum. Aut utraque illud credendum credendum credendum. Hæc credendum, ad credendum. Hæc credendum for the last the credendum credendum, which is more complicated and difficult.

CHAP. ENT and spontaneous production, created from 221.

nothing by the will of the father. The Son, by whom all things were made,* had been begotten before all worlds, and the longest of the astronomical periods could be compared only as a fleeting moment to the extent of his duration; yet this duration was not infinite,† and there had been a time which preceded the ineffable generation of the Logos. On this only begotten Son the Almighty Father had transfused his ample spirit, and impressed the effulgence of his glory. Visible image of invisible perfection, he saw, at an immeasurable distance beneath his feet, the throngs of the brightest archangels; yet he shone only with a reflected light, and, like the sons of the Roman emperors, who were invested with the titles of Cæsar or Augustus,‡ he governed the universe in obedience to the will of his father and monarch. 11. In the second hypothesis, the Logos possessed all the inherent, incommunicable perfections, which religion and philosophy appropriate to the Supreme God. Three distinct and infinite minds or substances, three co-eternal and co-eternal beings, composed the divine essence?¶

* As the doctrine of kindred creation from nothing, was gradually introduced among the christians (Barrow, trans. iv. p. 163-212), the dignity of the weakness very naturally rose with that of the soul.

† The metaphysics of Dr. Clarke (Scripture Testify, p. 276, 280), would admit no eternal generation from an infinite cause.

‡ This pretence with almost infinite is contradicted by several of the primitive fathers, particularly by Athanasius, in his apology to the emperor Marcellus and his son; and it is alleged, without success, by Basil himself. See Helms, Fil. Noms. in lib. i. c. 8, No. 4.

¶ See Cameron's Trinitarian System, p. 226, 278. This disjunct hypothesis was maintained by the two Gregories, of Nyssa and

and it would have implied contradiction, that any of them should not have existed, or that they should ever cease to exist.³ The advocates of a system which seemed to establish three independent deities, attempted to preserve the unity of the first cause, so conspicuous in the design and order of the world, by the perpetual consent of their administration, and the essential agreement of their will. A faint resemblance of this unity of action may be discovered in the societies of men, and even of animals. The causes which disturb their harmony proceed only from the imperfection and inequality of their faculties; but the omnipotence which is guided by infinite wisdom and goodness, cannot fail of choosing the same means for the accomplishment of the same ends. III, Three beings, who, by the self-derived necessity of their existence, possess all the divine attributes in the most perfect degree; who are eternal in duration, infinite in space, and intimately present to each other, and to the whole universe; irresistibly force themselves on the astonished mind, as one and the same being,⁴ who, in the economy of grace, as well as in that of and Newman, by Cyril of Alexandria, John of Damascus, and See Cantuaria, p. 625. La Caze, Bibliothèque Universelle, tom. xvi. p. 97-101.

³ Aquinas seems to carry the grounds of the philosophy, which makes separate principles . . . The passage, from Aristotle does not this principle, does not from Descartes, De Causis, Dec. 4. 22.

⁴ Boetius, who was deeply versed in the philosophy of Plato and Aristotle, explains the unity of the trinity by the difference of the three persons. See the judicious remarks of Le Clerc, Bibliothèque Chrétienne, tom. vii. p. 212, &c.

CHAP.
XXL

nature, may manifest himself under different forms, and be considered under different aspects. By this hypothesis, a real substantial trinity is reduced into a trinity of names, and abstract modifications, that subsist only in the mind which conceives them. The logos is no longer a person, but an attribute; and it is only in a figurative sense, that the epithet of son can be applied to the eternal reason which was with God from the beginning, and by which, not by whom, all things were made. The incarnation of the logos is reduced to a mere inspiration of the divine wisdom, which filled the soul, and directed all the actions of the man Jesus. Thus, after revolving round the theological circle, we are surprised to find that the sabellian ends where the eunomite had begun; and that the incomprehensible mystery which excites our admiration, eludes our inquiry.*

Council of Nice,
A. D. 325.

If the bishops of the council of Nice¹ had been permitted to follow by the unbiassed dictates

* If the sabellians were started at this conclusion, they were driven down another precipice into the confusion, that the Father was born of a virgin; that he descended on the cross; and that he sweat the blood of passion of Pains, passion, with which they were favoured by their adversaries. See the invention of Tertullian against Praxeas, and the impudent refutations of Methodius (p. 325, 331) and Beausobre, tom. 5, l. 3, 4, c. 4, p. 335.

¹ The transactions of the council of Nice are related by the ancient, not only in a partial, but in a very imperfect manner. Even a picture as Fox-Tucke would have drawn, can never be recovered; but such rude sketches as have been traced by the pencil of history, and that of reason, may be seen in Villaloni (Hist. Eccles. tom. 1, p. 469-476) and in Dr. Clark (Bibliotheca Universalis, tom. 2, p. 121-124).

of their consciences; Arius and his associates could scarcely have flattered themselves with the hopes of obtaining a majority of votes, in favour of an hypothesis so directly adverse to the two most popular opinions of the catholic world. The arianism soon perceived the danger of their situation, and prudently assumed those modest virtues, which, in the fury of civil and religious dissensions, are seldom practised, or even praised, except by the weaker party. They recommended the exercise of christian charity and moderation; urged the incomprehensible nature of the controversy; disclaimed the use of any terms or definitions which could not be found in the Scriptures; and offered, by very liberal concessions, to satisfy their adversaries, without renouncing the integrity of their own principles. The victorious faction received all their proposals with haughty suspicion, and anxiously sought for some irreconcilable mark of distinction, the rejection of which might involve the arians in the guilt and consequences of heresy. A letter was publicly read, and ignominiously torn, in which their patron, Eusebius of Nicomedia, ingeniously confessed, that the admission of the Homoionion, or Consubstantiality,¹ a word already familiar to the platonists, was incompatible with the principles of their theological system. The fortunate opportunity was eagerly embraced by the bishops, who governed the resolutions of the synod; and, according to the lively expression of Ambrose,² they used the sword,

¹ We are indebted to Ambrose de Fide, l. iii. cap. viii. for the knowledge of this curious anecdote. Hoc verbum philosophi patres

CHAP.
XXI.

which heresy itself had drawn from the scabbard, to cut off the head of the hated monster. The consubstantiality of the Father and the Son was established by the council of Nice, and has been unanimously received as a fundamental article of the christian faith by the consent of the Greek, the Latin, the Oriental, and the Protestant churches. But if the same word had not served to stigmatise the heretics, and to unite the catholics, it would have been inadequate to the purpose of the majority, by whom it was introduced into the orthodox creed. This majority was divided into two parties, distinguished by a contrary tendency to the sentiments of the trinitarists and of the sabellians. But as these opposite extremes seemed to overthrow the foundations either of natural, or revealed, religion, they mutually agreed to qualify the rigor of their principles; and to disavow the just, but inviolable, consequences, which might be urged by their antagonists. The interest of the common cause inclined them to join their numbers, and to conceal their differences: their animosity was softened by the healing counsels of toleration, and their disputes were suspended by the use of the mysterious Homousion, which either party was free to interpret according to their peculiar tenets. The sabellian sense, which, about fifty years before, had obliged the council of Antioch¹ to prohibit

¹ quod cum sancto patre unus sit (homousios), et consubstantialis, et co-æternus, et co-æqualis, et con-substantialis, quod veritatem suam hereticis non recipiunt.

² See a History of the Council of Nice, vol. II. c. 1, p. 23-24. The council is also daily to be seen in the cathedral of Nice.

this celebrated term, had endeared it to those theologians who entertained a secret but partial affection for a trinitarian trinity. But the more fashionable saints of the arise times, the intrepid Athanasius, the learned Gregory Nazianzen, and the other pillars of the church, who supported with ability and success the Nicene doctrine, appeared to consider the expression of substance, as if it had been synonymous with that of nature; and they ventured to illustrate their meaning, by affirming that those men, as they belong to the same common species, are consubstantial or homogenous to each other.² This pure and distinct equality was tempered, on the one hand, by the internal connection and spiritual penetration, which indissolubly unites the divine persons;³ and on the other, by the pre-eminence of the Father, which was acknowledged in as far as it is compatible with the independence of the Son.⁴ Within these limits the almost inviolable and tremulous hall of orthodoxy was allowed securely to vibrate. On either side, beyond this consecrated ground, the

¹⁰ According to Aristotle, the same were harmonious to each other, "That Harmonious Dances of the vulgar are to him, such have shown to be Pythagoras, Cratylus, Chrysarchus, La Chaire, &c. and to prove it, it would be tedious again." This is the first version of the fable (ed. G. p. 137), who classifies the other collectively with dancing, gambling, and music.

* See Pomeroy-Dodge, Timing, loc. cit. p. 137; and 138 p. 140-141; Footnote to 140, 141 loc. cit. p. 140-141, with Text. The argument is straightforward, is perhaps the simplest and clearest of the three, though not the most.

*The filed copies of will, Deed of the 7 years lease, and some of his writings, have since been, and others being, bequeathed to the university of the Father.

CHAP.
XXI

heretics and the demons lurked in ambush to surprise and devour the unhappy wanderer. But as the degrees of theological hatred depend on the spirit of the war, rather than on the importance of the controversy, the heretics who degraded, were treated with more severity than those who annihilated, the person of the Son. The life of Athanasius was consumed in irreconcilable opposition to the impious anabaptists of the arians; but he defended about twenty years the catholicism of Marcellus at Ancyra; and when at last he was compelled to withdraw himself from his communion, he continued to mention, with an ambiguous smile, the venial errors of his respectable friend.*

After
this.

The authority of a general council, to which the arians themselves had been compelled to submit, inscribed on the banners of the orthodox party the mysterious characters of the word Homoiousios, which essentially contributed, notwithstanding some obscure disputes, some nocturnal combats, to maintain and perpetuate the uniformity of faith, or at least of language. The consubstantialists, who by their success have deserved and obtained the title of catholics, gloried in the simplicity and steadiness of their own creed,

* The military opposition with which Athanasius and his followers opposed the arians, was that of anabaptism.

* Epiphanius, lib. 1. Hæres. 144. c. 1. p. 322. See the address of Marcellus, in Tolstus (Mém. Ecclésiast. vii. p. 180-186). His work is my book, of the unity of God, was preserved in the New Testament, which is the chief of the canon. After a long and careful examination of the text, it is found, lib. 1. c. 14. p. 18. has substantially preserved the catholicism of Marcellus.

and insulted the repeated variations of their adversaries, who were destitute of any certain rule of faith. The sincerity or the cunning of the arian chiefs, the fear of the laws of the people, their reverence for Christ, their hatred of Athanasius, all the causes, human and divine, that influence and disturb the counsels of a theological faction, introduced among the sectaries a spirit of discord and inconstancy, which, in the course of a few years, erected eighteen different models of religion,* and avenged the violated dignity of the church. The zealous Hilary,† who, from the peculiar hardships of his situation, was inclined to extenuate rather than to aggravate the errors of the oriental clergy, declares, that in the wide extent of the ten provinces of Asia, to which he had been banished, there could be found very few prelates who had preserved the knowledge of the true God.‡ The oppression which he had felt, the disorders of which he was the spectator and the victim, appeared, during a short interval,

* Athanasius in his epistle concerning the Synode of Neocesarea and Miletum (tom. i. p. 384-394) has given us ample list of arian events, which has been collected and improved by the labours of the noble Balthazar Tillamont (Mém. Eclesi. tom. vi. p. 457).

† Erasmus, with admirable sense and freedom, has delineated the just character of Hilary. To relate his story, to compare the merits of his life, and to justify his sentiments and conduct, is the province of the benevolent writer.

‡ Altera quædam christi et pacis erant res, et præsertim pars Arianæ doctrinæ præsertim, erat quæ nonnullis, vero Doctis occurrere. Atque illiusmodi gentes numerat, et eam prædictam rem, etiam legem, etiam quæ prædictam, Hilari de Synodo, et de Fide Orientalium, c. 82, p. 1166, seq. Recenset. In illa celebrata synodo interea ostendit et representat, the bishop of Auxerre would have been present in the philosophical society of Bayle and Fournier.

CHAP.
XXI.

the angry passions of his soul: and in the following passage, of which I shall transcribe a few lines, the bishop of Poitiers unwarily deviates into the style of a christian philosopher. "It is a thing," says Hilary, "equally deplorable and dangerous, that there are as many creeds as opinions among men, as many doctrines as inclinations, and as many sources of blasphemy as there are faults among us; because we make creeds arbitrarily, and explain them as arbitrarily. The homousion is rejected, and received, and explained away by successive synods. The partial or total resemblance of the father and of the son, is a subject of dispute for these unhappy times. Every year, nay every moon, we make new creeds to describe invisible mysteries. We repent of what we have done, we defend those who repent, we anathematise those whom we defended. We condemn either the doctrine of others in ourselves, or our own in that of others; and reciprocally tearing one another to pieces, we have been the cause of each other's ruin."

Notes
page.

It will not be expected, it would not perhaps be endured, that I should swell this theological digression, by a minute examination of the eighteen creeds, the authors of which, for the most part, disclaimed the odious name of their parent Arius. It is amusing enough to delineate the form, and to trace the vegetation, of a singular plant; but the tedious detail of leaves without flowers, and of branches without fruit, would soon exhaust the patience, and disappoint the curiosity, of the laborious student. One question which gradually arose from the arian controversy may, however, be noticed, as it served to produce and discriminate the three sects, who were united only by their common aversion to the homoeousion of the Nicene synod. 1. If they were asked, whether the son was like unto the father, the question was resolutely answered in the negative, by the heretics who adhered to the principles of Arius, or indeed to those of philosophy; which seem to establish an infinite difference between the creator and the most excellent of his creatures. This obvious consequence was maintained by Nitus,* on whom the zeal of his adversaries bestowed the surname of the atheist. His restless and aspiring spirit urged him to try almost every profession of human life. He was successively a slave, or at least a husbandman, a travelling stoker, a goldsmith, a physician, a schoolmaster, a theologian, and at last the apostle of a new church, which was propagated by the abilities of his disciple, Eunomius.† Armed with texts of scripture, and with

* Hilary de Poitiers, l. vi. c. 4, p. 1171, 1172. This remarkable passage shewed the stupidity of Mr. Locke, who has transmitted it verbatim, viz. p. 479 (the words of the new edition place back.

* In Philostorgius (l. ii. c. 11.) the character and attributes of Nitus appear singular enough, though they are carefully noticed by the writer of the Life. The editor Gosselin (p. 111.) who was more attached to his principles than to his authority, has collected the various circumstances which his various information have preserved or improved.

† According to the judgment of a man who required both these sciences, Nitus had been endowed with a stronger understanding.

captious syllogisms from the logic of Aristotle, the subtle Arius had acquired the name of an invincible disputant, whom it was impossible either to silence or to convince. Such talents engaged the friendship of the arian bishops, till they were forced to renounce, and even to persecute, a dangerous ally, who, by the accuracy of his reasoning, had prejudiced their cause in the popular opinion, and offended the piety of their most devoted followers. 2. The omnipotence of the creator suggested a specious and respectful solution of the likeness of the father and the son; and faith might humbly receive what reason could not presume to deny, that the supreme God might communicate his infinite perfections, and create a being similar only to himself.* These arians were powerfully supported by the weight and abilities of their leaders, who had ascended to the management of the eastern interest, and who occupied the principal thrones of the East. They detested, perhaps with some affectation, the impiety of Arius; they professed to believe, either without reserve, or according to the scriptures, that the son was different from all other creatures, and similar only to the father. But they denied that not-Essence had acquired more air and being (Πνεύματι ἕκτον, &c.). The controversy and apology of Eusebius of Caesarea. Histor. Eccl. torn. viii. p. 748-800 is one of the first historical papers which have escaped.

* Yet, according to the opinion of Euseb. and Bull (p. 187), there is no power, that is, nothing, which did need communicating as a creature. Father, who is eternally without the limits of mortal powers, but a Dispenser by him, and by such a verbalist Euseb. Dign. Institut. Euseb. torn. i. p. 41.

he was either of the same, or of a similar substance: sometimes boldly justifying their descent, and sometimes objecting to the use of the word substance, which seems to imply an inadequate, or at least a distinct, notion of the nature of the deity. 8. The sect which asserted the doctrine of a similar substance was the most numerous, at least in the provinces of Asia; and when the leaders of both parties were assembled in the council of Seleucia,^a their opinion would have prevailed by a majority of one hundred and five to forty-three bishops. The Greek word, which was chosen to express this mysterious resemblance, bears so close an affinity to the orthodox symbol, that the profane of every age have derided the furious contests which the difference of a single diphthong excited between the homoousians and the homoiousians. As it frequently happens, that the sounds and characters which approach the nearest to each other accidentally represent the most opposite ideas, the observation would be itself ridiculous, if it were possible to mark any real and sensible distinction between the doctrine of the semi-arians, as they were improperly styled, and that of the catholics themselves. The bishop of Pontiers, who, in his Phrygian exile, very wisely aimed at a coalition of parties, endeavours to prove that, by a plain and faithful interpretation,^b the homoiousians may be ^a Socrates (sup. lib. vi. c. 22) had reported the same. Athanasius and Hilary have explained the evidence of this article speedily: the other opponents which are referred to it are carefully collected by Baronius and Tillemont.

^b Philos. de la Trinité, &c. De l'essent. n. 77, p. 1140. In his work apologetical notes thus published by the homoiousians from a reduced to a consubstantial sense. Yet he confesses that the word has a dark and suspicious aspect; and, as if darkness were congenial to theological disputes, the semi-arians, who advanced to the doors of the church, assailed them with the most unrelenting fury.

CHAP.
XXI
.....

Pathos of the words em = 1, 2
in church.

The provinces of Egypt and Asia, which cultivated the language and manners of the Greeks, had deeply imbibed the venom of the arian controversy. The familiar study of the platonian system, a vain and argumentative disposition, a copious and flexible idiom, supplied the clergy and people of the East with an inexhaustible flow of words and distinctions; and, in the midst of their fierce contentions, they easily forgot the doubt which is recommended by philosophy, and the submission which is enjoined by religion. The inhabitants of the West were of a less inquisitive spirit; their passions were not so forcibly moved by invisible objects; their minds were less frequently exercised by the habits of dispute, and such was the happy ignorance of the Gallican church, that Hilary himself, above thirty years after the first general council, was still a stranger to the Nicene creed.* The Latins had received of Chastity he observed, that he used this cautious expression, not intelligent or layman, p. 1205. See p. 1146. Palladius, who saw these objects through a different medium, is believed to forget the difference of the important distinction. See in particular, vol. 17, and Galatry, p. 222.

* Victor Denis, cell, says, some persons, without evidence, suspect Hilary's orthodoxy. . . . His position is in opposition to the Nicene council. . . . The Nicene council is proved that he governed the diocese of Poitiers several years before his exile.

the rays of divine knowledge through the dark and doubtful medium of a translation. The poverty and stubbornness of their native tongue was not always capable of affording just equivalents for the Greek terms, for the technical words of the platonic philosophy,* which had been consecrated by the gospel or by the church, to express the mysteries of the christian faith; and a verbal defect might introduce into the Latin theology a long train of error or perplexity. But as the western provincials had the good fortune of deriving their religion from an orthodox source, they preserved with steadiness the doctrine which they had accepted with docility; and when the arian pestilence approached their frontier, they were supplied with the reasonable preservative of the homousion, by the paternal care of the Roman pontiff. Their sentiments and their temper were displayed in the memorable synod of Rimini, which surpassed in numbers the council of Nice, since it was composed of above four hundred bishops of Italy, Africa, Spain, Gaul, Britain, and Illyricum. From the first debates it appeared, that only fourscore prelates adhered to the party, though they affected to magnify the name and memory of Arius. But this inferiority was compensated by the advantages of skill, of experience,

CHAP.
XXI.Council of Rimini,
A. D. 359.

* Jerome (Epist. lii.), complains that even the use of the prepositions (the use of the boldier substantives) could not be expressed by a Latin word.

* The predomance which the fourth council of the Eastern at length gave to a ceremonial rather than a rational unity (see Peric. Hist. v. l. vi. c. 23. p. 441), was favoured by the Latin language's appearance to excite the idea of substance, instead of quality.

CHAP. and of discipline; and the minority was conducted XXX by Valens and Ursacius, two bishops of Illyria, who had spent their lives in the intrigues of courts and councils, and who had been trained under the eusebian banner, in the religious wars of the East. By their arguments and negotiations, they embarrassed, they confounded, they at last deceived, the honest simplicity of the Latin bishops, who suffered the palladium of the faith to be extorted from their hands by fraud and importunity, rather than by open violence. The council of Rimini was not allowed to separate, till the members had imprudently subscribed a captious creed, in which some expressions, susceptible of no heretical sense, were inserted in the room of the homoousion. It was on this occasion, that, according to Jeron, the world was surprised to find itself arian.* But the bishops of the Latin provinces had no sooner reached their respective dioceses, than they discovered their mistake, and repented of their weakness. The ignominious capitulation was rejected with disdain and abhorrence; and the homoousian standard, which had been shaken, but not overthrown, was more firmly replanted in all the churches of the West.[†]

Such was the rise and progress, and such were the natural revolutions of those theological dis-

Conduct
 of the council of Rimini
 in the year
 359

* Epistola Jeron. ad Valentinum et Ursacium. editio Hieronymi. editio Lucii. tom. 1. p. 143.

† The story of the council of Rimini is very elegantly told by Eusebius Hieronimus (Hist. Eccl. 1. 10. p. 419-420, editio Lucii. Bat. 1647) and by Jeron, in his Epistola ad Valentinum. The design of the latter is to apologise for the conduct of the Latin bishops, who were deceived, and who repented.

poies, which disturbed the peace of christianity CHAP 331
 under the reigns of Constantine and of his sons.
 But as those princes presumed to extend their despotism over the faith, as well as over the lives and fortunes, of their subjects: the weight of their suffrage sometimes inclined the ecclesiastical balance: and the prerogatives of the king of heaven were settled, or changed, or modified, in the cabinet of an earthly monarch.

The unhappy spirit of discord which pervaded Indifference of the provinces of the East interrupted the triumph Constantine of Constantine: but the emperor continued for 331, 332, 333.
 some time to view, with cool and careless indifference, the object of the dispute. As he was yet ignorant of the difficulty of appeasing the quarrels of theologians, he addressed to the contending parties, in Alexander and to Arius, a mederating epistle* which may be ascribed, with far greater reason, to the untutored sense of a soldier and statesman, than to the dictates of any of his episcopal counsellors. He attributes the origin of the whole controversy to a trifling and subtle question, concerning an inexpressible point of the law, which was foolishly asked by the bishop, and imprudently resolved by the presbyter. He laments that the christian people, who had the same God, the same religion, and the same worship, should be divided by such inconsiderable

* Eusebius, in Vit. Constant. l. II. c. 36-38. The principles of toleration, and religious indifference, contained in this epistle, have given great offence to Bunsen, Tillamont, &c. who suppose that the emperor had said to himself, either before or afterwards, at his depart. See Leclerc's Remarques, tom. II. p. 183.

CHAP.
XXI.

His real
a. c. 324

distinctions; and he seriously recommends to the clergy of Alexandria the example of the Greek philosophers, who could maintain their arguments without losing their temper, and assert their freedom without violating their friendship. The indifference and contempt of the sovereign would have been, perhaps, the most effectual method of silencing the dispute, if the popular current had been less rapid and impetuous, and if Constantine himself, in the midst of faction and tumult, could have preserved the calm possession of his own mind. But his ecclesiastical ministers soon contrived to seduce the impartiality of the magistrate, and to awaken the zeal of the proselyte. He was provoked by the insults which had been offered to his statues; he was alarmed by the real, as well as the imaginary, magnitude of the spreading mischief; and he extinguished the hope of peace and toleration, from the moment that he assembled three hundred bishops within the walls of the same palace. The presence of the monarch swelled the importance of the debate; his attention multiplied the arguments; and he exposed his person with a patient intrepidity, which animated the valour of the combatants. Notwithstanding the applause which has been bestowed on the eloquence and sagacity of Constantine, a Roman general, whose religion might be still a subject of doubt, and whose mind had not been enlightened either by study or by inspiration, was indifferently qualified to discuss, in the Greek language, a metaphysical question, or an article of faith. But the credit of his favourite Osius, who appears to have presided in the council of Nice, might dispose the emperor in favour of the orthodox party; and a well-timed insinuation, that the same Eusebians of Nicomedia, who now protected the heretic, had lately assisted the tyrant,¹ might exasperate him against their adversaries. The Nicene creed was ratified by Constantine; and his firm declaration, that those who resisted the divine judgment of the synod must prepare themselves for an immediate exile, annihilated the murmurs of a feeble opposition; which, from seventeen, was almost instantly reduced to two, protesting bishops. Eusebius of Caesarea yielded a reluctant and unliguous consent to the homousion;² and the wavering conduct of the Nicomedian Eusebius served only to delay, about three months, his disgrace and exile.³ The im-

He presents the Arian

pious Arius was banished into one of the remote provinces of Illyricum: his person and disciples were branded, by law, with the odious name of ¹ This extract preserved (G. L. c. 20) an epistle from Constantine to the people of Nicomedia, in which the monarch declares himself the public enemy of one of his subjects, he styles Eusebius, a wicked and perverse man, and he complains of his hostile behaviour during the civil war.

² See in Eusebius (G. L. c. 26) a letter in Theodoret G. L. c. 127, an original letter of Eusebius of Caesarea, in which he attempts to justify his subscribing the homousion. The character of Eusebius has always been a subject; but those who have read the second critical edition of Eusebius (see G. L. c. 26), must entertain a very unfavourable opinion of the orthodoxy and sincerity in the signing of Caesarea.

³ Athanasius, tom. I. p. 227. Palladius, l. i. c. 16, and Gelasius's Commentary, p. 41.

CHAP.
XXI.

porphyriads; his writings were condemned to the flames, and a capital punishment was denounced against those in whose possession they should be found. The emperor had now imbibed the spirit of controversy, and the angry, sarcastic style of his edicts was designed to inspire his subjects with the hatred which he had conceived against the enemies of Christ.*

and the orthodox party.
As the 204-212.

But, as if the conduct of the emperor had been guided by passion instead of principle, three years from the council of Nice were scarcely elapsed, before he discovered some symptoms of mercy, and even of indulgence, towards the proscribed sect, which was secretly protected by his favourite minister. The exiles were recalled; and Eusebius, who gradually resumed his influence over the mind of Constantine, was restored to the episcopal throne, from which he had been ignominiously degraded. Arius himself was treated by the whole court with the respect which would have been due to an innocent and oppressed man; his faith was approved by the synod of Jerusalem; and the emperor seemed impatient to repair his injustice, by issuing an absolute command, that he should be solemnly admitted to the communion in the cathedral of Constantinople. On the same day which had been fixed for the triumph of Arius, he expired;—and the strange and horrid circumstances of his death might excite a suspicion, that the orthodox saints had contributed more efficaciously than by their prayers, to deliver the church from the most formidable of her enemies.* The three principal leaders of the catholics, Athanasius of Alexandria, Eustathius of Antioch, and Paul of Constantinople, were deposed on various accusations, by the sentence of numerous councils, and were afterwards banished into distant provinces by the first of the christian emperors, who, in the last moments of his life, received the rites of baptism from the arian bishop of Nicomedia. The ecclesiastical government of Constantine cannot be justified from the reproach of levity and weakness. But the credulous monarch, unskilled in the stratagems of theological warfare, might be deceived by the modest and specious professions of the heretics, whose sentiments he never perfectly understood; and while he protected Arius, and persecuted Athanasius, he still considered the council of Nice as the bulwark of the christian faith, and the peculiar glory of his own reign.†

* Baronius, 2. 1. & 2. In his various letters, which were addressed to the several emperors, Constantine employed against the Arianists the arms of ridicule and even violence.

* We derive the original story from Athanasius (tom. i. p. 610), who expresses little reluctance to ascribe the recovery of the dead. He might exaggerate, but the proposed councils of Alexandria and Constantinople would have rendered it dangerous to insert. Those who prize the literal narrative of the death of Jesus (his corpse actually hung out in a gibbet) must make their opinion heresimipotent and heretical.

† The change in the sentiments, or at least in the conduct, of Constantine may be traced in Eusebius (in Vita Constantini l. ii. c. 33, l. iii. c. 34); Socrates (l. i. c. 25-29); Sozomen (l. ii. c. 15-30); Theodoret (l. i. c. 14-23); and Theodoret (l. ii. c. 1-17). But the text of these writers was too near the verge of error, and the editors were too cautious from it. It is singular enough, that the important task of reconstructing the history of the church, should have been left for this legend and a legend.

CHAP.
XXI.Constantine
this Emperor the Armen.A. D.
324-361.

The sons of Constantine must have been admitted from their childhood into the rank of catechumens, but they imitated, in the delay of their baptism, the example of their father. Like him, they presumed to pronounce their judgment on mysteries into which they had never been regularly initiated; and the fate of the trinitarian controversy depended, in a great measure, on the sentiments of Constantius, who inherited the provinces of the East, and acquired the possession of the whole empire. The arrian presbyter or bishop, who had secreted for his use the testament of the deceased emperor, improved the fortunate occasion which had introduced him to the familiarity of a prince, whose public counsels were always swayed by his domestic favourites. The eunuchs and slaves diffused the spiritual poison through the palace, and the dangerous infection was communicated by the female attendants to the guards, and by the empress to her unsuspecting husband. The partiality which Constantius always expressed towards the eusebian faction was insensibly fortified by the dextrous management of their leaders; and his victory over the tyrant Magnentius increased his inclination, as well as ability, to employ the arms of power in the cause of arrianism. While the two armies were engaged in the plains

* Quis attinet cum machinamenta conspirationis hinc, moxque inde, uterque patrum monuit. Idem, Sermon, Hic, Sermon 1.º, p. 410.

† Constantius, A. D. 324, p. 2. Idem, Sermon 1.º, p. 410. Idem, Sermon 1.º, p. 410. He observes that the passage in the original version of the Life of Constantine by Eusebius is Constantine's History, vol. 1.º, p. 25, with a various reading in Constantine's, which reads with one of the best copies of Constantine's.

of Mursa, and the fate of the two rivals depended on the chance of war, the son of Constantine passed the anxious moments in a church of the martyrs, under the walls of the city. His spiritual comforter, Valens, the arian bishop of the diocese, employed the most artful precautions to obtain such early intelligence as might secure either his favour or his escape. A secret chain of swift and trusty messengers informed him of the vicissitudes of the battle; and while the courtiers stood trembling round their affrighted master, Valens assured him that the Gallic legions gave way, and insinuated, with some presence of mind, that the glorious event had been revealed to him by an angel. The grateful emperor ascribed his success to the merits and intercession of the bishop of Mursa, whose faith had deserved the public and miraculous approbation of heaven.^a The arians, who considered as their own the victory of Constantine, preferred his glory to that of his father.^b Cyril, bishop of Jerusalem, immediately composed the description of a celestial cross, encircled with a splendid rainbow, which, during the festival of Pentecost, about the third hour of the day, had

^a Sozomenus Historia, de Vita, Constantini l. iii. p. 405, 406.

^b Cyril (apud Baron. a. m. 323, No. 29), expressly observed, that the sign of Constantine the Great had been fixed in the bowels of the earth; but that it had appeared, in the sign of Constantine, in the midst of the heavens. This repetition evidently proves, that Cyril was ignorant of the mysterious manner in which the conversion of Constantine is attested; and this ignorance is the more surprising, since it was no more than twelve years after his death that Cyril was appointed bishop of Jerusalem, by the immediate command of Basilides of Caesarea. See Tillamont, Memoires, tom. viii. p. 244.

CHAP.
XXI.

—

appeared over the mount of Olives, to the edification of the devout pilgrims, and the people of the holy city.* The size of the meteor was gradually magnified; and the arian historian has ventured to affirm, that it was conspicuous to the two armies in the plains of Pannonia; and that the tyrant, who is purposely represented as an idolater, fled before the auspicious sign of orthodox christianity.†

Arian
contests.

The sentiments of a judicious stranger, who has impartially considered the progress of civil or ecclesiastical discord, are always entitled to our notice; and a short passage of Ammianus, who served in the armies, and studied the character, of Constantine, is perhaps of more value than many pages of theological invectives. — The christian “religion, which, in itself,” says that moderate historian, “is plain and simple, is confounded by the damage of superstition. Instead of reconciling the parties by the weight of his authority, he cherished and propagated, by verbal disputes, the differences which his vain curiosity had excited. The highways were covered with troops of bishops, galloping from every side to the assemblies, which they call synods; and while they laboured to reduce the whole sect to their own particular opinions, the public estab-

* It is not easy to conceive how the testimony of Cyril might be supported by some natural appearance of a meteor.

† Philostorgius, l. vii. c. 26. — He is followed by the author of the Alexandrian Chronicle, by Orosius, and by Nicephorus the Greek. Orosius, p. 448. They could not relate a miracle, even from the hand of an enemy.

"ishment of the poets was almost ruined by their "hasty and repeated journeys." Our more intimate knowledge of the ecclesiastical transactions of the reign of Constantius, would furnish an ample commentary on this remarkable passage;
 which justifies the rational apprehensions of Athanasius, that the restless activity of the clergy, who wandered round the empire in search of the true faith, would excite the contempt and laughter of the unbelieving world.* As soon as the emperor was relieved from the terrors of the civil war, he devoted the leisure of his winter-quarters at Arles, Milan, Simium, and Constantinople, to the amusements or toils of controversy; the sword of the magistrate, and even of the tyrant, was unsheathed, to enforce the tenets of the theologian;
 and, as he opposed the orthodox faith of Nice, it is readily confessed that his incapacity and ignorance were equal to his presumption.† The eunuchs, the women, and the bishops, who governed the vain and feeble mind of the emperor, had inspired him with an insuperable dislike to the Homoionion; but his timid conscience was

* See indeed a passage still stronger to be mentioned. Chalcidius religious abstemious of voluptuous, and temperate and sober, and to that virtuous perfection, quite uncorrupted genius, without dissipation, and a pure profound sense of all circumstances virtuous, it contains institutions, justice, public and private, education, propriety (sine voluptate) from which comes all good nature common (Vulgus) made consider, and institutio, bonorum, omnia. Aeneas, lib. 12, v. 370.

† Allusion, lib. 1, p. 370.

* See also, lib. 1, p. 370. Constantius, lib. 1, c. 15-31. Theodosius, lib. 1, c. 15-31. Philostorgius, lib. 1, c. 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

CHAP. XLII. alarmed by the impiety of Arius. The guilt of that atheist was aggravated by the suspicious favour of the unfortunate Gallus : and even the deaths of the imperial ministers who had been massacred at Antioch, were imputed to the suggestions of that dangerous sophist. The mind of Constantius, which could neither be moderated by reason, nor fixed by faith, was blindly impelled to either side of the dark and empty abyss, by his horror of the opposite extreme : he alternately embraced and condemned the sentiments ; he successively banished and recalled the leaders, of the arrian and semi-arian factions.¹ During the season of public business or festivity he employed whole days, and even nights, in selecting the words, and weighing the syllables, which composed his fluctuating creed. The subject of his meditation still pursued and tormented his slumbers ; the incoherent dreams of the emperor were received as celestial visions ; and he accepted with complacency the lofty title of bishop of bishops, from those ecclesiastics who forgot the interest of their order for the gratification of their passions. The design of establishing an uniformity of doctrine, which had engaged him to convene so many synods in Gaul, Italy, Illyricum, and Asia, was repeatedly baffled by his own

¹ Seebeck, l. v. c. 32. Arrianus. Opus l. p. 331. Tillmanns Opus. Index. luc. c. 347. has collected several instances of the singular language of Constantius from the collected fragments of the works of Cyprian. The very titles of these fragments require need and terror : " Meditationes pro Deo," " De Regimine Imperatoris," " De non communienda cum Hæreticis," " De non parando," " De non," &c.

CHAP.
XXI.

levity, by the divisions of the arians, and by the resistance of the catholics; and he resolved, as the last and decisive effort, imperiously to dictate the decrees of a general council. The destructive earthquake of Nicomedia, the difficulty of finding a convenient place, and perhaps some secret motives of policy, produced an alteration in the summons. The bishops of the East were directed to meet at Seleucia, in Isauria; while those of the West held their deliberations at Rimini, on the coast of the Adriatic; and, instead of two or three deputies from each province, the whole episcopal body was ordered to march. The Eastern council, after consuming four days in force and unavailing debate, separated without any definitive conclusion. The council of the West was protracted till the seventh month. Taurus, the praetorian prefect, was instructed not to dismiss the prelates till they should all be united in the same opinions; and his efforts were supported by a power of banishing fifteen of the most refractory, and a promise of the consulship if he achieved so difficult an adventure. His prayers and threats, the authority of the sovereign, the sophistry of Valens and Ursacius, the distress of cold and hunger, and the tedious melancholy of a hopeless exile, at length extorted the reluctant consent of the bishops of Rimini. The deputies of the East and of the West attended the emperor in the palace of Constantinople, and he enjoyed the satisfaction of imposing on the world a profession of faith which established the liberty, without expressing the consubstantiality, of the Son of

CHAP.
XXI.

100

God? But the triumph of arianism had been preceded by the removal of the orthodox clergy, whom it was impossible either to intimidate or to corrupt; and the reign of Constantius was disgraced by the unjust and ineffectual persecution of the great Athanasius.

1. Chrysomelidae
 2. Chrysomelidae
 3. Chrysomelidae
 4. Chrysomelidae
 5. Chrysomelidae
 6. Chrysomelidae
 7. Chrysomelidae
 8. Chrysomelidae
 9. Chrysomelidae
 10. Chrysomelidae
 11. Chrysomelidae
 12. Chrysomelidae
 13. Chrysomelidae
 14. Chrysomelidae
 15. Chrysomelidae
 16. Chrysomelidae
 17. Chrysomelidae
 18. Chrysomelidae
 19. Chrysomelidae
 20. Chrysomelidae
 21. Chrysomelidae
 22. Chrysomelidae
 23. Chrysomelidae
 24. Chrysomelidae
 25. Chrysomelidae
 26. Chrysomelidae
 27. Chrysomelidae
 28. Chrysomelidae
 29. Chrysomelidae
 30. Chrysomelidae
 31. Chrysomelidae
 32. Chrysomelidae
 33. Chrysomelidae
 34. Chrysomelidae
 35. Chrysomelidae
 36. Chrysomelidae
 37. Chrysomelidae
 38. Chrysomelidae
 39. Chrysomelidae
 40. Chrysomelidae
 41. Chrysomelidae
 42. Chrysomelidae
 43. Chrysomelidae
 44. Chrysomelidae
 45. Chrysomelidae
 46. Chrysomelidae
 47. Chrysomelidae
 48. Chrysomelidae
 49. Chrysomelidae
 50. Chrysomelidae
 51. Chrysomelidae
 52. Chrysomelidae
 53. Chrysomelidae
 54. Chrysomelidae
 55. Chrysomelidae
 56. Chrysomelidae
 57. Chrysomelidae
 58. Chrysomelidae
 59. Chrysomelidae
 60. Chrysomelidae
 61. Chrysomelidae
 62. Chrysomelidae
 63. Chrysomelidae
 64. Chrysomelidae
 65. Chrysomelidae
 66. Chrysomelidae
 67. Chrysomelidae
 68. Chrysomelidae
 69. Chrysomelidae
 70. Chrysomelidae
 71. Chrysomelidae
 72. Chrysomelidae
 73. Chrysomelidae
 74. Chrysomelidae
 75. Chrysomelidae
 76. Chrysomelidae
 77. Chrysomelidae
 78. Chrysomelidae
 79. Chrysomelidae
 80. Chrysomelidae
 81. Chrysomelidae
 82. Chrysomelidae
 83. Chrysomelidae
 84. Chrysomelidae
 85. Chrysomelidae
 86. Chrysomelidae
 87. Chrysomelidae
 88. Chrysomelidae
 89. Chrysomelidae
 90. Chrysomelidae
 91. Chrysomelidae
 92. Chrysomelidae
 93. Chrysomelidae
 94. Chrysomelidae
 95. Chrysomelidae
 96. Chrysomelidae
 97. Chrysomelidae
 98. Chrysomelidae
 99. Chrysomelidae
 100. Chrysomelidae

We have seldom an opportunity of observing, either in active or speculative life, what effect may be produced, or what obstacles may be surmounted, by the force of a single mind, when it is inflexibly applied to the pursuit of a single object. The immortal name of Athanasius* will never be separated from the catholic doctrine of the trinity, to whose defence he consecrated every moment and every faculty of his being. Educated in the family of Alexander, he had vigorously opposed the early progress of the arian heresy; he exercised the important functions of secretary under the aged patriarch; and the fathers of the Nicaene council beheld, with surprise and respect, the rising virtues of the young deacon. In a time of public danger, the dull chains of age and of

¹ Ibid., from Time, March 6, 1945, p. 418-419. The United States had been the sponsor of the attack on the Axis.

4 We may even call Oleary's Notebook a record of progress instead of a life of achievement, but we should stop and consider the advantage of standing on more reliable ground than the flimsy sand of his own opinion and spelling out, as p. 200-211. I shall not ignore the example of Shakespeare's G. K. S. who provided the first editorial history without going behind the text to consult the writings of Shakespeare. Yet even Shakespeare's more serious for states, and the learned Theodore, among the life of Athenian, with the notes of substantial plays; if the director, of Shakespeare's from 1912 and of the Shakespeare's plays, has replaced every line, and arranged every detail.

rank are sometimes superseded; and within five months after his return from Nice, the deacon Athanasius was seated on the archiepiscopal throne of Egypt. He filled that eminent station above forty-six years, and his long administration was spent in a perpetual combat against the powers of arianism. Five times was Athanasius expelled from his throne; twenty years he passed as an exile or a fugitive; and almost every province of the Roman empire was successively witness to his merit, and his sufferings in the cause of the homousion, which he considered as the sole pleasure and business, as the duty, and as the glory, of his life. Amidst the storms of persecution, the archbishop of Alexandria was patient of labour, jealous of fame, careless of safety; and although his mind was tainted by the contagion of fanaticism, Athanasius displayed a superiority of character and abilities, which would have qualified him, far better than the degenerate sons of Constantine, for the government of a great monarchy. His learning was much less profound and extensive than that of Eusebius of Caesarea, and his rude eloquence could not be compared with the polished oratory of Gregory or Basil; but whenever the primate of Egypt was called upon to justify his sentiments, or his conduct, his unpremeditated style, either of speaking or writing, was clear, forcible, and persuasive. He has always been revered, in the orthodox school, as one of the most accurate masters of the christian theology; and he was supposed to possess two profane sciences, less adapted to the episcopal character, the knowledge of jurisprudence,* and that of divination.[†] Some fortunate conjectures of future events, which impartial reasoners might ascribe to the experience and judgment of Athanasius, were attributed by his friends to heavenly inspiration, and imputed by his enemies to infernal magic.

CHAP.
XXI.

TRANSLATION

But as Athanasius was continually engaged with the prejudices and passions of every order of men, from the monk to the emperor, the knowledge of human nature was his first and most important science. He preserved a distinct and unbroken view of a scene which was incessantly shifting, and never failed to improve those decisive moments which are irrecoverably past before they are perceived by a common eye. The archbishop of Alexandria was capable of distinguishing how far he might boldly command, and where he must dexterously insinuate; how long he might contend with power, and when he must withdraw from persecution; and while he directed the thunders of the church against heresy and rebellion, he could assume, in the bosom of his own party, the flexible and indulgent temper of a prudent leader. The election of Athanasius has not escaped the reproach of irregularity and precipitation;[‡] but the propriety of his behaviour conciliated the affections both of the clergy and of the people. The Alexandrians were impatient to rise in arms for the defence of an eloquent and liberal pastor. In his distress he always derived support, or at least consolation, from the faithful attachment of his parochial clergy; and the hundred bishops of Egypt adhered, with unshaken zeal, to the cause of Athanasius. In the modest equipage, which pride and policy would affect, he frequently performed the episcopal visitation of his provinces, from the mouth of the Nile to the confines of Ethiopia, familiarly conversing with the meanest of the populace, and humbly saluting the saints and hermits of the desert.* Nor was it only in ecclesiastical assemblies, among men whose education and manners were similar to his own, that Athanasius displayed the ascendancy of his genius. He appeared with easy and respectful firmness in the courts of princes; and in the various turns of his prosperous and adverse fortune, he never lost the confidence of his friends, or the esteem of his enemies.

* Epistola Secunda (Hist. Eccl. T. II. p. 266) calls him a lawyer, a jurisconsult. This character neither can be imagined either in the life or writings of Athanasius.

† The learned editor (supra) of Fortunius seems, upon inspection, to have mistaken some scholasticall notions attributed to Fortunius for those of Athanasius, viz. T. A prophecy, or rather a poem, is cited by Fortunius p. 11, p. 116, which evidently proves that the same poet whom Athanasius understood the language of the oracles.

‡ The irregular promotion of Athanasius was highly censured by the sectaries which were laid against him. See Philosoph. T. II.

In his youth, the prince of Egypt related the great Constantine, who had repeatedly signified Protest-

tion against Athanasius.

* See the History of the Fathers of the Desert, published by Barrow, &c. and Tillamond's Hist. Eccles. tom. vii. in the life of Kyrillos, Patriarch, &c. Athanasius himself, who did not content to enjoy the life of a Bishop, Ambrose, has carefully inserted here with the life of the Bishop and proposed the mention of the same hermit. Athanas. tom. ii. p. 321-322, &c.

CHAP.
XXI

his will, that Armin should be restored to the catholic communion.* The emperor respected, and might forgive, this inflexible resolution; and the faction who considered Athanasius as their most formidable enemy, were constrained to dissemble their hatred, and silently to prepare an indirect and distant assault. They scattered rumours and suspicions, represented the archbishop as a proud and oppressive tyrant, and boldly accused him of violating the treaty which had been ratified in the Nicene council, with the schismatic followers of Melchius.† Athanasius had openly disapproved that ignominious peace, and the emperor was disposed to believe that he had abused his ecclesiastical and civil power, to persecute those seditious sectaries; that he had sacrilegiously taken a challenge in one of their churches of Marseilles; that he had whipped or imprisoned six of their bishops; and that Arsenius, a seventh bishop of the same party, had been murdered, or at least mutilated, by the cruel hand of the pri-

* At the Conference proposed in speaking, but engaged in writing, an opposed assembly gathered. He, however, gradually assumed a collected mind, and while he requested that the presence of the church should be open to all, he avoided the odious issue of Armin. Athanasius, like a skilful politician, has sensibly limited those distinctions (see, l. p. 709), which would have been too exact and silly.

† The confusion in Egypt, like the discord in Armin, was produced by an intestine quarrel which arose from the preservation of some ancient houses to pursue the ancient enmities, which seems to have been aggravated by the partiality of Athanasius, and the ignorance of Eusebius. See Huet's General History of the Church, lib. 1, p. 267.

mate.¹ These charges, which affected his honour and his life, were referred by Constantine to his brother Dalmatius the censor, who resided at Antioch; the synods of Caesarea and Tyre were successively convened; and the bishops of the East were instructed to judge the cause of Athanasius, before they proceeded to consecrate the new church of the resurrection at Jerusalem. The primate might be conscious of his innocence; but he was sensible that the same implacable spirit which had dictated the persecution, would direct the proceedings, and pronounce the sentence. He profusely declined the tribunal of his enemies, despised the summons of the synod of Caesarea; and, after a long and artful delay, submitted to the peremptory commands of the emperor, who threatened to punish his criminal disobedience if he refused to appear in the council of Tyre.² Before Athanasius, at the head of fifty Egyptian prelates, sailed from Alexandria, he had wisely secured the alliance of the melitians; and Arsenius himself, his imaginary rival, and his secret friend, was privately concealed in his train. The synod of Tyre was assisted by Eusebius of Caesarea, with more passion, and with less art, than his learning and experience ought prompt;

a. a. 335.

¹ The treatment of the six bishops is specified by Jerome, l. ii. c. vii. but Dalmatius himself, according to the account of Ammonius and Origenes, seems this great assembly without a vote.

² Athanasius, opusc. p. 194; Sozomen, l. ii. c. xli. Sozomen, l. ii. c. lli. The strategy in his epistle of expression (libellus) at the Council, l. ii. c. xli., must be regarded as one of the charges, and it was most, that possible, that the synod would apply these resolutions to Athanasius.

CHAP.
XXI.

his numerous faction repeated the names of his murder and tyrant : and their clamours were encouraged by the seeming patience of Athanasius, who expected the decisive moment to produce Arminius alive, and unhurt, in the midst of the assembly. The nature of the other charges did not admit of such clear and satisfactory replies ;
yet the archbishop was able to prove, that, in the village, where he was accused of breaking a consecrated chalice, neither church nor altar nor chalice could really exist. The arians, who had secretly determined the guilt and condemnation of their enemy, attempted, however, to disguise their injustice by the imitation of judicial forms ;
the synod appointed an episcopal commission of six delegates to collect evidence on the spot ; and this measure, which was vigorously opposed by the Egyptian bishops, opened new scenes of violence and perjury.* After the return of the deputies from Alexandria, the majority of the council pronounced the final sentence of degradation and exile against the primate of Egypt.
The decree, expressed in the fiercest language of malice and revenge, was communicated to the emperor and the catholic church ; and the bishops immediately resumed a mild and devout aspect, such as became their holy pilgrimage to the sepulchre of Christ.

* See, in particular, the second Apology of Athanasius (vol. i. p. 743-874) and his Epistles to the monks (p. 105-404). They are justified by original and authentic documents ; but they would inspire more confidence, if he appeared less interested, and less determined for himself.

* Translated by V. B. Constantine, L. 16, c. 42-47.

But the injustice of these ecclesiastical judges CHAP.
XXI.
had not been countenanced by the submission, or even by the presence, of Athanasius. He re- His Act Public.
c. 230.
solved to make a bold and dangerous experiment, whether the throne was inaccessible to the voice of truth; and before the final sentence could be pronounced at Tyre, the intrepid primate threw himself into a bark which was ready to hoist sail for the imperial city. The request of a formal audience might have been opposed or eluded;
but Athanasius concealed his arrival, watched the moment of Constantine's return from an adjacent villa, and boldly encountered his angry sovereign as he passed on horseback through the principal street of Constantinople. So strange an apparition excited his surprise and indignation; and the guards were ordered to remove the unfortunate suitor; but his resentment was subdued by involuntary respect; and the haughty spirit of the emperor was awed by the courage and eloquence of a bishop, who implored his justice, and awakened his conscience.* Constantine listened to the complaints of Athanasius with impartial, and even gracious, attention; the members of the synod of Tyre were summoned to justify their procedure; and the arts of the eusebian faction would have been confounded, if they had not aggravated the guilt of the primate, by the dexterous supposition of an unpardonable offence; a criminal design to intercept and detain the corn-

* Athanasius vita, c. 4, p. 103. The emperor is said to have been so struck by the conduct of Athanasius, that he immediately ordered a public assembly for a purpose, that might be the cause of a similar conduct in the future.

CHAP.
XXI.

fleet of Alexandria, which supplied the necessities of the new capital.^a The emperor was satisfied that the peace of Egypt would be secured by the absence of a popular leader; but he refused to fill the vacancy of the archiepiscopal throne; and the sentence, which, after a long hesitation, he pronounced, was that of a jealous ostracism, rather than of an ignominious exile. In the remote province of Gaul, but in the hospitable court of Treves, Athanasius passed about twenty-eight months. The death of the emperor changed the face of public affairs; and amidst the general indulgence of a young reign, the private was restored to his country by an honourable edict of the younger Constantine, who expressed a deep sense of the innocence and merit of his venerable guest.^b and were lost.

A. D. 336.the second edict.
A. D. 342.

The death of that prince exposed Athanasius to a second persecution; and the feeble Constantine, the sovereign of the East, soon became the secret accomplice of the eusebians. Ninety bishops of that sect or faction assembled at Antioch, under ^a Athanas. tom. i. p. 179. Eusebius has related the Visit Egypt, p. 28, 31, 334. Constantine a strange example of the cruelty and jealousy of Constantine on a similar occasion. The emperor Eusebius, a Syrian philosopher, rejected his bishopric, and provided the maintenance of Athanasius his pretensions against. The next day was declared the feast of a week's work; the people of Alexandria were divided (said), and Eusebius was believed, in a charge that he had found the words by the power of magic. Besides which, that Constantine wished to prove, by this operation, that he had thoroughly examined the operations of the goddess.

^b In his return he saw Constantine, at Constantinople, and at Caesarea in Cappadocia. Athanas. tom. i. p. 344. Eusebius expresses that Constantine attributed him to the removal of the three royal books in Alexandria. Athanas. tom. i. p. 344.

the specious pretence of dedicating the cathedral. They composed an ambiguous creed, which is faintly tinged with the colours of semi-arianism, and twenty-five canons, which still regulate the discipline of the orthodox Greeks.* It was decided, with some appearance of equity, that a bishop, deposed by a synod, should not resume his episcopal functions, till he had been absolved by the judgment of an equal synod: the law was immediately applied to the case of Athanasius; the council of Antioch pronounced, or rather confirmed, his degradation: a stranger, named Gregory, was seated on his throne; and Philagrius,† the prefect of Egypt, was instructed to support the new primate with the civil and military powers of the province. Oppressed by the conspiracy of the Asiatic prelates, Athanasius withdrew from Alexandria, and passed three years as an exile and a suppliant at the holy threshold

* See Bertriche Fathers, tom. 6, p. 428-432, and tom. 8, Antiphona, p. 181. Tillemont Hist. Eccles. tom. vi, p. 310-314: 80. Office of Culture has mentioned this synod at Antioch with too much honour and respect. He mentions thirty-seven bishops.

† This magistracy, as called by Athanasius, is named by Gregory Nazianzen, tom. 1. Orat. vol. p. 205, 211.

Supra primate. Deo hunc hunc hunc hunc.

For the profits of narrow notions, I am also disposed to discover some good qualities in those men, whom party has represented as tyrants and monsters.

* The chronological difficulties which perplex the relations of Athanasius at Rome, are commonly solved by Vossius (Historia de Calisto, tom. 2. Titul. Eccles. 1. 1. c. 1-3); and Tillemont (Mem. Eccles. tom. vi, p. 314, &c.). I have followed the former by persons of Vossius, who allows only one journey, after the election of Calisto.

CHAP. of the vaticani.* By the assiduous study of the XXI. Latin language, he soon qualified himself to negotiate with the western clergy; his decent flattery swayed and directed the haughty Julius; the Roman pontiff was persuaded to consider his appeal as the peculiar interest of the apostolic see; and his innocence was unanimously declared in a council of fifty bishops of Italy. At the end of three years, the primate was summoned to the court of Milan by the emperor Constant, who, in the indulgence of unlawful pleasures, still professed a lively regard for the orthodox faith. The cause of truth and justice was promoted by the influence of gold;† and the ministers of Constant advised their sovereign to require the convocation of an ecclesiastical assembly, which might act as the representatives of the catholic church. Ninety-four bishops of the West, seventy-six bishops of the East encountered each other at Sardica, on the verge of the two empires, but in the demi-

a. v. 340.

* Expositio fidei transcribitur a Iuliano observatione of Wretchen (Philologus, v. v. p. 119) Si enim Christiani Ecclesiam hanc venerabilem pariter jam fidei auctoritatem, cum, non contentis, ostendit Gregorius dicitur in sua patris scholasticum, legimus, de quibus membris, tantum non arguitur, cum patet quod videret complures Romanos confugisse, et Constantinus, postquam omnia ostendit, eorum patris opposuit per pontificem in episcopos latine adfuerunt peritissimos, quos orthodoxum in synodo constituit. Fuit et eorum Athanasius, non sine amissionem, Romanus patris, gloriosissime ad beatum.

† Philologus, l. vi, c. 12. If any corruption was used to promote the interest of religion, the emperor of Athens might justly or wisely thus commendable conduct, by the example of Calig and Nero; the former of whom is said to have given, and the latter to have suffered, a blow, to the cause of liberty.

nions of the protector of Athanasius. Their debates soon degenerated into hostile alienations; the Asiatics, apprehensive for their personal safety, retired to Philippopolis in Thrace; and the rival synods reciprocally hurled their spiritual thunders against their enemies, whom they piously condemned as the enemies of the true God. Their decrees were published and ratified in their respective provinces; and Athanasius, who, in the West, was revered as a saint, was exposed as a criminal to the abhorrence of the East.* The council of Sardica reveals the first symptoms of discord and schism between the Greek and Latin churches, which were separated by the accidental difference of faith, and the permanent distinction of language.

During his second exile in the West, Athanasius ^{and pres-} was frequently admitted to the imperial presence; ^{at Rome.} at Capua, Lodi, Milan, Verona, Padua, Aquileia, and Treves. The bishop of the diocese usually presided at these interviews; the master of the offices stood before the veil or curtain of the sacred apartment; and the uniform moderation of the primate might be attested by these respectable witnesses, to whose evidence he solemnly appeals.^a Prudence would undoubtedly suggest

* The council, which often appeals to the Roman pontiff, has almost raised the council of Nicaea to the dignity of a general council; and it will have been ignorantly or actually contaminated with those of the Nicene synod. See Tillemont, tom. viii. p. 488, and Gualter's Tracts, vol. 6. p. 454-460.

^a An Athanasius (Epiphanius) once wrote against Constantine (see the Epistle to the Marites, at the same time that he assured him of his profound respect, we might distrust the professions of the same Bishop. — Tom. i. p. 477.

CHAP.
XXI.

the mild and respectful tone that became a subject and a bishop. In these familiar conferences with the sovereign of the West, Athanasius might lament the error of Constantine; but he boldly ascribed the guilt of his ruin to his arian prelates; deplored the distress and danger of the catholic church; and excited Constantine to emulate the zeal and glory of his father. The emperor declared his resolution of employing the troops and treasures of Europe in the orthodox cause; and signified, by a comely and peremptory epistle to his brother Constantius, that unless he consented to the immediate restoration of Athanasius, he himself, with a fleet and army, would seat the archbishop on the throne of Alexandria.* But this religious war, so horrible to nature, was prevented by the timely compliance of Constantine; and the emperor of the East condescended to solicit a reconciliation with a subject whom he had injured. Athanasius waited, with decent pride, till he had received three successive epistles, full of the strongest assurances of the protection, the favour, and the esteem of his sovereign: who invited him to resume his episcopal seat, and who added the flattering pretension of engaging his principal ministers to attest the sincerity of his intentions. They were manifested in a still more public manner, by the strict orders which were dispatched into Egypt to recal the adherents of

* It is to be observed that the account given of Athanasius, and the reconciliation of a private friendship by Constantine, these matters are proved by the unquestionable evidence of letters of Constantine, and other of Constantine himself. See Tillemont, tom. viii. p. 172.

Athanasius, to restore their privileges, to proclaim their innocence, and to erase from the public registers the illegal proceedings which had been obtained during the prevalence of the eusebian faction. After every satisfaction and security had been given, which justice or even delicacy could require, the primate proceeded, by slow journeys, through the provinces of Thracia, Asia, and Syria; and his progress was marked by the abject homage of the oriental bishops, who excited his contempt without deceiving his penetration.* At Antioch he saw the emperor Constantius; sustained, with modest firmness, the embraces and protestations of his master, and eluded the proposal of allowing the arians a single church at Alexandria, by claiming, in the other cities of the empire, a similar toleration for his own party: a reply which might have appeared just and moderate in the mouth of an independent prince. The entrance of the archbishop into his capital was a triumphal procession; absence and persecution had endeared him to the Alexandrians; his authority, which he exercised with rigour, was more firmly established; and his fame was diffused from Ethiopia to Britain, over the whole extent of the christian world.[†]

* I have always entertained some doubts concerning the exactitude of Eusebius and Valens (Athanasii hæm. l. i. p. 178). Their epistles to Julius, Bishop of Rome, and to Alexander himself, are so different & inconsistent with each other, that they cannot both be genuine. The one speaks the language of criminals who justify their guilt and injury; the other of ascetics, who solicit on equal terms an unexampled reconciliation.

† The exactness of his second return may be inferred from Athanasius himself, hæm. l. i. p. 169, and 222-243. See also, l. ii.

CHAP.
XXI.

History—book of Constanti-nus
in p. 331.

But the subject who has reduced his prince to the necessity of dissembling, can never expect a sincere and lasting forgiveness; and the tragic fate of Constant soon deprived Athenodorus of a powerful and generous protector. The civil war between the maximi and the only surviving brother of Constant, which afflicted the empire above three years, secured an interval of repose to the catholic church; and the two contending parties were desirous to conciliate the friendship of a bishop, who, by the weight of his personal authority, might determine the fluctuating resolutions of an important province. He gave audience to the ambassadors of the tyrant, with whom he was afterwards accused of holding a secret correspondence; and the emperor Constantius repeatedly assured his dearest father, the most reverend Athanasius, that, notwithstanding the malicious rumours which were circulated by their common enemies, he had inherited the sentiments, as well as the throne, of his deceased brother.¹ Gratitude and humanity would have disposed the primate of Egypt to deplore the untimely fate of Constant, and to abhor the guilt of Magnentius; but as he clearly understood that the apprehensions of Constantius were his only safeguard, the fervour of his prayers for the success of the righteous cause might perhaps be somewhat abated. The ruin of Athanasius was no longer contrived by the obscure malice of a few bigoted or angry bishops, who abused the authority of a credulous monarch. The monarch himself avowed the resolution, which he had so long suppressed, of avenging his private injuries: and the first winter after his victory, which he passed at Arles, was employed against an enemy more odious to him than the vanquished tyrant of Gaul.

¹ c. 18. Historia, l. vii. c. 10. Thcodoret, N. ii. c. 11, 12. Philostorgius, l. vii. c. 12.

² Athanasius opus, l. p. 977, 978, contains the discourse by the above-mentioned, without additions, and without corrections. He admits that letters had been forged in his name; but he requires that his own constitutions, and those of the synod, may be examined whether they have indeed been written by the former, or revised by the latter.

³ Athanasius opus, l. p. 931, 934.

If the emperor had capriciously decreed the death of the most eminent and virtuous citizen of the republic, the cruel order would have been executed without hesitation, by the ministers of open violence or of specious injustice. The caution, the delay, the difficulty with which he proceeded in the condemnation and punishment of a popular bishop, discovered to the world that the privileges of the church had already revived a sense of order and freedom in the Roman government. The sentence which was pronounced in the synod of Tyre, and subscribed by a large majority of the eastern bishops, had never been expressly repealed; and as Athanasius had been once degraded from his episcopal dignity by the judgment of his brethren, every subsequent act might be considered as irregular, and even criminal. But the memory of the firm and effectual support which the primate of Egypt had derived

Councils of Arles and Miles,
p. 11,
112, 113.

* Athanasius, lib. 1. c. 381. Theodosius, l. 1. c. 14. The emperor Theodosius, that more justice to bishop Athanasius, than he had done by synod of Nicaea, or Tyre.

CHAP.
XXI.

from the attachment of the western church, engaged Constantine to suspend the execution of the sentence, till he had obtained the concurrence of the Latin bishops. Two years were consumed in ecclesiastical negotiations; and the important cause between the emperor and one of his subjects was solemnly debated, first in the synod of Arles, and afterwards in the great council of Milan,* which consisted of above three hundred bishops. Their integrity was gradually undermined by the arguments of the arians, the dexterity of the eunuchs, and the pressing solicitations of a prince, who gratified his revenge at the expence of his dignity; and exposed his own passions, whilst he influenced those of the clergy. Corruption, the most infallible symptom of constitutional liberty, was successfully practised: honours, gifts, and immunities, were offered and accepted as the price of an episcopal vote;† and the condemnation of the Alexandrian primate was artfully represented as the only measure which could restore the peace and union of the catholic church. The friends of Athanasius were not, however, wanting to their

* The affairs of the council of Milan are so imperfectly and erroneously related by the Greek writers, that we must refer to the copy of some letters of Basilides, translated by Ruffinus, from the archives of the church of Vercelles, and of several acts of Dionysius of Milan, published by Bollandus. See Supplément, t. ii. p. 133, and Thésaurus, t. ii. p. 1413.

† The eunuchs, priests, deacons, which remained, as many bishops, are mentioned with indignation by those who see too pure or too polluted things there. "We should have History of Ponticus against Constantine the architect, who speaks the holy legend of several things the king," and some other priests, and eunuchs, about Hilarion. Historia Constantini, t. 2, p. 144.

leader, or to their cause. With a manly spirit, which the sanctity of their character rendered less dangerous, they maintained, in public debate, and in private conference with the emperor, the eternal obligation of religion and justice. They declared, that neither the hope of his favour, nor the fear of his displeasure, should prevail on them to join in the condemnation of an absent, an innocent, a respectable brother.^b They affirmed, with apparent reason, that the illegal and obsolete decrees of the council of Tyre had long since been tacitly abolished by the imperial edicts; the honourable re-establishment of the archbishop of Alexandria, and the silence or recantation of his most clamorous adversaries. They alleged, that his innocence had been attested by the unanimous bishops of Egypt, and had been acknowledged in the councils of Rome and Sardica; by the impartial judgment of the Latin church. They deplored the hard condition of Athanasius, who, after enjoying so many years his seat, his reputation, and the seeming confidence of his sovereign, was again called upon to confute the most ground-

^a Something of this opposition is mentioned by Ambrose (iv. 17.) who had a very early and extensive knowledge of ecclesiastical history. Lactantius persequens sanctitatem, non solum hominum, sed militum doctrinam, etiam Africanus esse existens, et quod in Syria reconditus, imperatoris amicitiam. Idcirco Id. Athanasius eruditus in Syria, &c.

^b More precisely by the orthodox part of the council of Sardica. If the bishops of Rome further had early noted, the Bishop would have been 74 in 343. M. de Tillemont (loc. cit. vol. p. 1147-1158), is justly surprised that so small a majority should have proceeded so vigorously against their adversaries, the principal of whom they had previously opposed.

CHAP.
XXI.

less and extravagant accusations. Their language was specious; their conduct was honourable; but in this long and obstinate contest, which fixed the eyes of the whole empire on a single bishop, the ecclesiastical factions were prepared to sacrifice truth and justice to the more interesting object of defending, or reviving, the intrepid champion of the nicene faith. The arians still thought it prudent to disguise in ambiguous language, their real sentiments and designs; but the orthodox bishops, armed with the favour of the people, and the decrees of a general council, insisted on every occasion, and particularly at Milan, that their adversaries should purge themselves from the suspicion of heresy, before they presumed to arraign the conduct of the great Athanasius.*

Constantine condemns Athanasius
A. D. 335.

But the voice of reason (if reason was indeed on the side of Athanasius) was silenced by the clamours of a factious or venal majority; and the councils of Arles and Milan were not dissolved, till the archbishop of Alexandria had been solemnly condemned and deposed by the judgment of the western, as well as of the eastern, church. The bishops who had opposed, were required to subscribe the sentence; and to unite in religious communion with the suspected leaders of the adverse party. A formula of consent was transmitted by the messengers of state to the absent bishops; and all those who refused to submit their private opinion to the public and inspired wisdom of the councils of Arles and Milan, were immediately furnished by the emperor, who affected to execute the decrees of the catholic church. Among those prelates who led the honourable band of confessors and exiles, Liberinus of Rome, Osius of Cordova, Paulinus of Treves, Dionysius of Milan, Eusebius of Vercella, Lucifer of Cagliari, and Hilary of Poitiers, may deserve to be particularly distinguished. The eminent station of Liberinus, who governed the capital of the empire; the personal merit and long experience of the venerable Osius, who was revered as the favourite of the great Constantine, and the father of the nicene faith; placed those prelates at the head of the Latin church: and their example, either of submission or resistance, would probably be imitated by the episcopal crowd. But the repeated attempts of the emperor, to seduce or to intimidate the bishops of Rome and Cordova, were for some time ineffectual. The Spaniard declared himself ready to suffer under Constantine, as he had suffered threescore years before under his grandfather Maximian. The Roman, in the presence of his sovereign, asserted the innocence of Athanasius, and his own freedom. When he was furnished to Bursa in Thrice, he sent back a large sum which had been offered for the accommodation of his journey; and insulted the court of Milan by the haughty remark, that the emperor and his concubs might want that gold to pay their soldiers and their bishops.* The

* See the Sentence in 422a. Socrus, l. ii. p. 116.

* The call to Liberinus is mentioned by Augustine, xv. l. 36. See Eusebius, l. iv. c. 18. Adrianus, max i. p. 634-637. Hilary, Presb. apost. l. i.

HÆC.
XXI.

[Theodosius]

resolution of Liberius and Osius was at length subdued by the hardships of exile and confinement. The Roman pontiff purchased his return by some criminal compliances: and afterwards expiated his guilt by a reasonable repentance. Persuasion and violence were employed to extort the reluctant signature of the decrepid bishop of Cordova, whose strength was broken, and whose faculties were perhaps impaired, by the weight of an hundred years; and the insolent triumph of the arians provoked some of the orthodox party to treat with inhuman severity the character, or rather the memory, of an unfortunate old man, to whose former services christianity itself was so deeply indebted.*

EUSEB.

The fall of Liberius and Osius reflected a brighter lustre on the firmness of those bishops who still adhered, with unshaken fidelity, to the cause of Athanasius and religious truth. The ingenious malice of their enemies had deprived them of the benefit of mutual comfort and advice, separated those illustrious exiles into distant provinces, and carefully selected the most inhospitable spots of a great empire.† Yet they

* The life of Osius is collected by Tillemont (Ann. vii. p. 276-304), who in the most extravagant terms has calumniated this prelate, the bishop of Cordova. In the midst of these calumnies on his fall, the presence of Athanasius may be easily perceived from the bold and intemperate tone of Hilary.

† The confines of the West were not then confined to the shores of Africa or Thracia, the sandy plains of Syria, Persia, the white sands of Egypt, which were in the possession of the impious usurpers, &c. When the heretic Osius was banished, he was exiled to Magonia or Elora, the place of his exile was soon experienced that the deserts of Libya, and the most barbarous tracts of Cappadocia, were less inhospitable, than the residence of those cities in which an arian bishop could satiate, without restraint, the exquisite rancour of theological hatred.* Their consolation was derived from the consciousness of rectitude and independence; from the applause, the visits, the letters, and the liberal alms of their adherents; and from the satisfaction which they soon enjoyed of observing the intestine divisions of the adversaries of the nicene faith. Such was the nice and capricious taste of the emperor Constantine; and so easily was he offended by the slightest deviation from his imaginary standard of christian truth, that he persecuted, with equal zeal, those who defended the consubstantiality, those who asserted the similar substance, and those who denied the likeness, of the Son of God. Three bishops, degraded and banished for those adverse opinions, might possibly meet in the same place of exile; and according to the difference of their temper, might either pity or insult the blind enthusiasm of their antagonists, whose present sufferings would never be compensated by future happiness.

changed, by the bishop of Ammon, at Antioch, a doctrine which suited the arians, and followed by war and persecution. Preface, l. i. c. 2.

* See the usual arguments and strange subtleties of Theodorus, in his own defence, published by Bunsen, v. p. 226. His 25-102.

† Calixtus and his successors, while with apostolic pretensions pre-empting us to suppose, either temporal jurisdiction power and plebs excluded, or exempt from pontifical jurisdiction. Balg. Secret. Hist. Rom. p. 414. Address, tom. 4. p. 226-230.

CHAP.
XXI.

Third expulsion of Athanasius
from Alexandria.
A. D. 326.

The disgrace and exile of the orthodox bishops of the West were designed as so many preparatory steps to the ruin of Athanasius himself.* Six-and-twenty months had elapsed, during which the imperial court secretly laboured, by the most insidious arts, to remove him from Alexandria, and to withdraw the allowance which supplied his popular liberality. But when the primate of Egypt, deserted and proscribed by the Latin church, was left destitute of any foreign support, Constantine dispatched two of his secretaries with a verbal commission to announce and execute the order of his banishment. As the justice of the sentence was publicly avowed by the whole party, the only motive which could restrain Constantine from giving his messengers the sanction of a written mandate, must be imputed to his doubt of the event; and to a sense of the danger to which he might expose the second city, and the most fertile province of the empire, if the people should persist in the resolution of defending, by force of arms, the innocence of their spiritual father. Such extreme caution afforded Athanasius a specious pretence respectfully to dispute the truth of an order, which he could not reconcile, either with the equity, or with the former declarations,

* Ample materials for the history of the persecution of Athanasius may be found in his own works. See particularly his very able apology for Constantine (tom. I. p. 422.) and his Apology for the right to the Holy See, printed at the Vatican in 1690, and the delightful proposal of the people of Alexandria to make him abbot, circulated by Eusebius (p. 1666). See also (tom. II. p. 100) the story how the emperor was at three longhouses and how he became ill.

of his gracious master. The civil powers of Egypt found themselves inadequate to the task of persuading or compelling the priests to abdicate his episcopal throne; and they were obliged to conclude a treaty with the popular leaders of Alexandria, by which it was stipulated that all proceedings and hostilities should be suspended till the emperor's pleasure had been more distinctly ascertained. By this seeming moderation, the catholics were deceived into a false and fatal security; while the legions of the Upper Egypt, and of Libya, advanced, by secret orders and hasty marches, to besiege, or rather to surprise, a capital habituated to sedition, and inflamed by religious zeal.^a The position of Alexandria, between the sea and the lake Mareotis, facilitated the approach and landing of the troops; who were introduced into the heart of the city, before any effectual measures could be taken either to shut the gates, or to occupy the important posts of defence. At the hour of midnight, twenty-three days after the signature of the treaty, Syriacus, duke of Egypt, at the head of five thousand soldiers, armed and prepared for an assault, unexpectedly invested the church of St. Theonas, where the archbishop, with a party of his clergy and people, performed their nocturnal devotions. The doors of the sacred edifice yielded to the impetu-

^a Athanasius had lately sent the Anagoras, and some of his chosen monks. They descended from their monastery, descended to the Alexandria and the vicinity of Alexandria, and were immediately confined by the soldiers, as they were the gates of the city. Athanasius, lib. 4. c. 10. 11. 12. See also Historia Ecclesiae, lib. 4. c. 10. 11. 12.

CHAP.
XXI.

osity of the attack, which was accompanied with every horrid circumstance of tumult and bloodshed; but as the bodies of the slain, and the fragments of military weapons, remained the next day an unexceptionable evidence in the possession of the catholics, the enterprise of Syrianius may be considered as a successful irruption, rather than as an absolute conquest. The other churches of the city were profaned by similar outrages; and, during at least four months, Alexandria was exposed to the insults of a licentious army, stimulated by the ecclesiastics of an hostile faction. Many of the faithful were killed: who may deserve the name of martyrs, if their deaths were neither provoked nor revenged; bishops and presbyters were treated with cruel ignominy; consecrated virgins were stripped naked, scourged, and violated; the houses of wealthy citizens were plundered; and, under the mask of religious zeal, lust, avarice, and private resentment, were gratified with impunity, and even with applause. The pagans of Alexandria, who still formed a numerous and discontented party, were easily persuaded to desert a bishop whom they feared and esteemed. The hopes of some peculiar favours, and the apprehension of being involved in the general penalties of rebellion, engaged them to promise their support to the destined successor of Athanasius, the famous George of Cappadocia. The usurper, after receiving the consecration of an acian synod, was seated on the episcopal throne by the arms of Sebastian, who had been appointed count of Egypt for the excution of that important design. In the use, as CHAP. well as in the acquisition, of power, the tyrant XXXI George disregarded the laws of religion, of justice, and of humanity; and the same scenes of violence and scandal which had been exhibited in the capital, were repeated in more than ninety episcopal cities of Egypt. Encouraged by success, Constantius ventured to approve the conduct of his ministers. By a public and passionate epistle, the emperor congratulates the deliverance of Alexandria from a popular tyrant, who deluded his blind votaries by the magic of his eloquence; expatiates on the virtues and piety of the most reverend George, the elected bishop; and aspires, as the patron and benefactor of the city, to surpass the fame of Alexander himself. But he solemnly declares his unalterable resolution to pursue with fire and sword the seditious adherents of the wicked Athanasius, who, by flying from justice, has confessed his guilt, and escaped the ignominious death which he had so often deserved.*

Athanasius had indeed escaped from the most ^{his beha-} imminent dangers; and the adventures of that extraordinary man deserve and fix our attention. On the memorable night when the church of St. Theonas was invested by the troops of Syriacus, the archbishop, seated on his throne, expected, with calm and intrepid dignity, the approach of death. While the public devotion was inter-

* Athanasius, tom. i. p. 634. The emperor, in his usual secretions, while they express their resentment, betray their fear and distress of Athanasius.

CHAP.
XXI.

rupted by shouts of rage and cries of terror, he animated his trembling congregation to express their religious confidence, by chanting one of the psalms of David, which celebrates the triumph of the God of Israel over the haughty and impious tyrant of Egypt. The doors were at length burst open; a cloud of arrows was discharged among the people; the soldiers, with drawn swords, rushed forwards into the sanctuary; and the dreadful gleam of their armour was reflected by the holy luminaries which burnt round the altar.* Athanasius still rejected the pious importunity of the monks and presbyters, who were attached to his person; and nobly refused to desert his episcopal station, till he had dismissed in safety the last of the congregation. The darkness and tumult of the night favoured the retreat of the archbishop; and though he was oppressed by the waves of an agitated multitude, though he was thrown to the ground, and left without sense or motion, he still recovered his undaunted courage, and eluded the eager search of the soldiers, who were instructed by their arion guides, that the head of Athanasius would be the most acceptable present to the emperor. From that moment the primate of Egypt disappeared from the eyes of his enemies, and remained above six years concealed in impenetrable obscurity.†

* These scenes of destruction are described by the monks, who were usually removed from the palace, which was afterwards possessed three days afterwards by the soldiers of Alexandria. Athanasius, torn, l. p. 342.

† The Jesuits have often compared Athanasius to Arnold, and have expounded with pleasure on the faith and hope, the merit and utility

The despotic power of his implacable enemy filled the whole extent of the Roman world; and the exasperated monarch had endeavoured, by a very pressing epistle to the christian princes of CHAP. XXI. Illustre, 316-323. Ethiopia, to exclude Athanasius from the most remote and sequestered regions of the earth. Counts, prefects, tribunes, whole armies, were successively employed to pursue a bishop and a fugitive; the vigilance of the civil and military powers were excited by the imperial edicts; liberal rewards were promised to the man who should produce Athanasius, either alive or dead; and the most severe penalties were denounced against those who should dare to protect the public enemy.* But the deserts of Thebais were now peopled by a race of wild, yet submissive fanatics, who preferred the commands of their abbot to the laws of their sovereign. The numerous disciples of Antony and Pachomius received the fugitive primate as their father, admired the patience and humility with which he conformed to their strictest institutions, collected every word which dropt from his lips as the genuine effusions of inspired wisdom, and persuaded themselves, that their prayers, their fasts, and their vigils, were less meritorious than the zeal which they expressed, note of some celebrated doctors. This excellent parallel is very deservedly admired by the Abbé de la Rivière, Vie de Jovien, tom. 2, p. 182.

* Hinc jam non ulla prodigum Athanasius, nec ullus ei terror ad instantem expostulat. Tiberius, Pichard, Combes, exordium quinet, ad persequendum non peruenit, sedque impetitionem, perinde subactam propositam, et quæ non vivens, et idcirco, persequitur Athanasius detestatur. Balan. l. 1, c. 15.

CHAP.
XXI.

and the dangers which they braved, in the defence of truth and innocence.* The monasteries of Egypt were seated in lonely and desolate places; on the summit of mountains, or in the islands of the Nile; and the sacred horn or trumpet of Tabenne was the well-known signal which assembled several thousand robust and determined monks, who, for the most part, had been the peasants of the adjacent country. When their dark retreats were invaded by a military force, which it was impossible to resist, they silently stretched out their necks to the executioner: and supported their national character, that tortures could never wring from an Egyptian the confession of a secret which he was resolved not to disclose.^b The archbishop of Alexandria, for whose safety they eagerly devoted their lives, was lost among a uniform and well-disciplined multitude; and on the nearer approach of danger, he was swiftly removed, by their officious hands, from one place of concealment to another, till he reached the formidable deserts, which the gloomy and credulous temper of superstition had peopled with daemons and savage monsters. The retirement of Athanasius, which ended only with the life of Constantine, was spent, for the most part, in the society of the monks, who faithfully served him as guards, as secretaries, and as messengers;

* *Origen. Nazianzen. Aug. 3. Origen. c. 10, p. 348. 353. See Tillemont. Mém. Eccles. tom. i. c. p. 176-180 & 400-402.*

^b Et nullis tormentorum thesauris taliter potuit: quia obsequium gentis hebreæ fuerat: deinde aliorum populi: ut iuxta prophetam dicit. Amicus xili, 16, and Valentin ad Iohann.

but the importance of maintaining a more intimate connection with the catholic party tempted him, whenever the diligence of the pursuit was abated, to emerge from the desert, to introduce himself into Alexandria, and to trust his person to the discretion of his friends and adherents. His various adventures might have furnished the subject of a very entertaining romance. He was once secreted in a dry cistern, which he had scarcely left before he was betrayed by the treachery of a female slave; and he was once concealed in a still more extraordinary asylum, the house of a virgin, only twenty years of age, and who was celebrated in the whole city for her exquisite beauty. At the hour of midnight, as she related the story many years afterwards, she was surprised by the appearance of the archbishop in a loose undress, who, advancing with hasty steps, conjured her to afford him the protection which he had been directed by a celestial vision to seek under her hospitable roof. The pious maid accepted and preserved the sacred pledge which was entrusted to her prudence and courage. Without imparting the secret to any one, she instantly conducted Athanasius into her most secret chamber, and watched over his safety with the tenderness of a friend, and the assiduity of a servant. As long as the danger continued, she regularly supplied him with books and provisions, washed his feet, managed his correspondence, and dexterously concealed from the eye of suspicion, this familiar and solitary intercourse between a saint whose character required the most unblemished chastity, and a female whose charms might excite the most dangerous emotions.² During the six years of persecution and exile, Athanasius repeated his visits to his fair and faithful companion; and the formal declaration, that he was the counsellor of Rimini and Seleucia,³ forces us to believe that he was secretly present at the time and place of their convocation. The advantage of personally negotiating with his friends, and of observing and improving the divisions of his enemies, might justify, in a prudent statesman, so bold and dangerous an enterprise; and Alexandria was connected by trade and navigation with every part of the Mediterranean. From the depth of his inaccessible retreat, the intrepid pontiff waged an incessant and offensive war against the protector of the arians; and his assiduous writings, which were diligently circulated and eagerly perused, contributed to unite and animate the orthodox party. In his public apologies, which he addressed to the emperor himself, he sometimes

* Robin. l. 4. c. 18; Socrus. l. 16. c. 10. This and the following story will be rendered impossible, if we suppose that Athanasius always inhabited the asylum which he ultimately, or accidentally, had made.

CHAP.
XXI.

² Philadelp. Hist. London p. 136, in Vol. Patmos p. 270. The original author of this anecdote, but converging with the church, who, in her old age, remembered with pleasure as pious and honourable a deviation. 'I cannot indulge the details of Basilica, Tiberius, Titus, etc., who almost reject a story as unworthy, as they deem it of the gravity of ecclesiastical history.'

³ Athanas. tom. 4. p. 408. I agree with Tillemont (ibid. tom. 4. p. 1037) that his expressions imply a personal, though perhaps secret, visit to the synod.

CHAP.
XIII.

afforded the praise of moderation; whilst at the same time, in secret and vehement invectives, he exposed Constantine as a weak and wicked prince, the executioner of his family, the tyrant of the republic, and the antichrist of the church. In the height of his prosperity, the victorious monarch, who had chastised the rashness of Gallus, and suppressed the revolt of Sylvanus, who had taken the diadem from the head of Vetricia, and vanquished in the field the legions of Magnentius, received from an invisible hand a wound, which he could neither heal nor revenge; and the son of Constantine was the first of the christian princes who experienced the strength of those principles, which, to the name of religion, could resist the most violent exertions of the civil power.

The persecution of Athanasius, and of so many ^{Asian} respectable bishops, who suffered for the truth of ^{bishops} their opinions, or at least for the integrity of their conscience, was a just subject of indignation and discontent to all christians, except those who were blindly devoted to the arian faction. The people regretted the loss of their faithful pastors, whose banishment was usually followed by the in-

¹ The epistle of Athanasius to the monks is filled with reproaches, which the public must feel to be true and just, p. 138. & 139. and, in compliance to his readers, he has introduced the comparison of Pharaoh, Ahab, Belshazzar, &c. The boldness of Henry was attended with the danger, if he published his invective in field, after the event of Juring; his Lacine met the throne of Constantine, but could not challenge the sword of martyrdom. See Tillemont, tom. vii. p. 203.

CHAP. tribution of a stranger⁴ into the episcopal chair; and loudly complained that the right of election was violated, and that they were condemned to obey a mercenary usurper, whose person was unknown, and whose principles were suspected. The catholics might prove to the world, that they were not involved in the guilt and heresy of their ecclesiastical governor, by publicly testifying their dissent, or by totally separating themselves from his communion. The first of these methods was invented at Antioch, and practised with such success, that it was soon diffused over the christian world. The doxology, or sacred hymn, which celebrates the glory of the trinity, is susceptible of very nice, but material, inflexions; and the substance of an orthodox, or an heretical creed, may be expressed by the difference of a disjunctive, or a copulative particle. Alternate responses, and a more regular psalmody,⁵ were introduced into the public service by Flavianus and Diodorus, two devout and active laymen, who were attached to the nicene faith. Under their conduct, a swarm of monks issued from the adjacent desert, bands of well-disciplined singers were stationed in the cathedral of Antioch, the glory to the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost,^a was triumphantly chanted by a full chorus of voices; and the catholics insulted, by the purity of their doctrine, the arian prelate, who had usurped the throne of the venerable Eustathius. The same zeal which inspired their songs, prompted the more scrupulous members of the orthodox party to form separate assemblies, which were governed by the presbyters till the death of their exiled bishop allowed the election and consecration of a new episcopal pastor.^b The revolutions of the court multiplied the number of pretenders; and the same city was often disputed, under the reign of Constantius, by two, or three, or even four bishops, who exercised their spiritual jurisdiction over their respective followers, and alternately lost and regained the temporal possessions of the church. The abuse of christianity introduced into the Roman government new causes of tyranny and sedition; the bands of civil society were torn asunder by the fury of religious factions; and the obscure citizen, who might calmly have surveyed the elevation and fall of successive em-

⁴ Athanasius tom. i. p. 311 compares the general of this assembly, which he afterwards exemplifies as, both in the promotion election of Faith. These councils represented the Russian people, and three prelates, who followed the court, assumed the functions of the bishops of the Schismatics previous.

⁵ Theodosius (Disciplina de Egiptu, tom. 4. l. 6. c. 72, 73. p. 365. 734) has collected many curious facts concerning the origin and progress of church-singing, both in the East and West.

^a Philostorgius, l. iii. c. 13. Gieseler has examined this subject with singular acuteness (p. 147, &c.). There were three distinct forms: "To the Father by the Son, and in the Holy Ghost;" "To the Father, and the Son, in the Holy Ghost;" and "To the Father in the Son and the Holy Ghost."

^b After the exile of Eustathius, under the reign of Constantius, the Arian party of the orthodox formed a separation which afterwards degenerated into a schism, and lasted about twenty years. See TILLY, Mon. Eccles. torn. vii. p. 32-34, 1131-1138, tom. xiv. p. 377-382, 1314-1332. In many churches the arian and Eustathians, who had consumed each other's communion, continued for some time to join in prayer. Philostorgius, l. ii. c. 14.

CHAP.
XXI.

persons, imagined and experienced, that his own life and fortune were connected with the interests of a popular ecclesiastic. The example of the two capitals, Rome and Constantinople, may serve to represent the state of the empire, and the temper of mankind, under the reign of the sons of Constantine.

Rome.

1. The Roman pontiff, as long as he maintained his station and his principles, was guarded by the warm attachment of a great people: and could reject with scorn, the prayers, the menaces, and the oblations of an heretical prince. When the eunuchs had secretly pronounced the exile of Liberius, the well-grounded apprehensions of a tumult engaged them to use the utmost precautions in the execution of the sentence. The capital was invested on every side, and the prefect was commanded to seize the person of the bishop: either by stratagem, or by open force. The order was obeyed, and Liberius, with the greatest difficulty, at the hour of midnight, was swiftly conveyed beyond the reach of the Roman people, before their consternation was turned into rage. As soon as they were informed of his banishment into Thrace, a general assembly was convened, and the clergy of Rome bound themselves, by a public and solemn oath, never to desert their bishop, never to acknowledge the usurper Felix, who, by the influence of the eunuchs, had been irregularly chosen and consecrated within the walls of a profane palace. At the end of two years, their pious obduracy subsisted entire and unshaken: and when Const-

thus visited Rome, he was assailed by the importunate solicitations of a people, who had preserved, as the last remnant of their ancient freedom, the right of treating their sovereign with familiar insolence. The wives of many of the senators and most honourable citizens, after pressing their husbands to intercede in favour of Liberius, were advised to undertake a commission, which, in their hands, would be less dangerous, and might prove more successful. The emperor received with politeness these female deputies, whose wealth and dignity were displayed in the magnificence of their dress and ornaments: he admired their inflexible resolution of following their beloved pastor to the most distant regions of the earth; and consented that the two bishops, Liberius and Felix, should govern in peace their respective congregations. But the ideas of toleration were so repugnant to the practice, and even to the sentiments of those times, that when the answer of Constantius was publicly read in the circus of Rome, so reasonable a project of accommodation was rejected with contempt and ridicule. The eager vehemence which animated the spectators in the decisive moment of a horse-race, was now directed towards a different object: and their cries resounded with the shout of thousands, who repeatedly exclaimed, "One God, one Christ, one bishop." The zeal of the Roman people in the cause of Liberius, was not confined to words alone; and the dangerous and bloody sedition which they excited soon after the departure of Constantius, determined that prince to accept the submission of the exiled prelate, and to restore him to the undivided dominion of the capital. After some ineffectual resistance, his rival was expelled from the city by the permission of the emperor, and the power of the opposite faction; the adherents of Paelix were inhumanly murdered in the streets, in the public places, in the baths, and even in the churches; and the face of Rome, upon the return of a christian bishop, renewed the horrid image of the massacres of Marcius, and the proscriptions of Sylla.¹

CHAP.
XXI.

Constanti-
nople.

11. Notwithstanding the rapid increase of christianism under the reign of the Flavian family, Rome, Alexandria, and the other great cities of the empire, still contained a strong and powerful faction of infidels, who envied the prosperity, and who ridiculed, even on their theatres, the theological disputes of the church. Constantinople alone enjoyed the advantage of being born and educated in the bosom of the faith. The capital of the East had never been polluted by the worship of idols; and the whole body of the people had deeply imbibed the opinions, the virtues, and the passions, which distinguished the christians of that age from the rest of mankind. After the death of Alexander, the episcopal throne was disputed by Paul and Maccedonius. By their zeal and abilities they both deserved the eminent station to which they aspired; and if the moral character of Macedonius was less exceptionable, his competitor had the advantage of a prior election, and a more orthodox doctrine. His firm attachment to the Nicene creed, which has given Paul a place in the calendar among saints and martyrs, exposed him to the resentment of the arians. In the space of fourteen years he was five times driven from the throne; to which he was more frequently restored by the violence of the people, than by the permission of the prince; and the power of Macedonius could be secured only by the death of his rival. The unfortunate Paul was dragged in chains from the sandy deserts of Mesopotamia to the most desolate places of mount Taurus,* confined in a dark and narrow dungeon, left six days without food, and at length strangled, by the order of Philip, one of the principal ministers of the emperor Constantius.† The first blood which stained the new capital was spilt in this ecclesiastical contest; and many persons were slain on

¹ See, on this violent and cruel revolution of Rome, Augustine, l. vi. c. 17. Athanasius, torn. 1. p. 164. 165. Sozomenus, l. vi. c. 13. Theodoret, l. ii. c. 17. Euseb. seven. lib. vi. c. 1. p. 415. Hieronymus, Chron. Maximian. et Postum. libell. p. 3. 4. Tillemont, Mem. Eccles. tom. vi. p. 336.

* Cucus was the last stage of his life and sufferings. The situation of this lonely town, on the borders of Cappadocia, Galatia, and the Lesser Armenia, has sometimes some geographical propriety; but we are directed to the true spot by the survey of the Roman road from Caesarea to Amida. See Gilbert's Geography, tom. ii. p. 123. Wandering of Diocletian, p. 176-177.

† Athenensis tract. i. p. 705-711, 818L. asserts, in the most positive terms, that Paul was murdered; and appeals not only to ancient Jews, but even to the unanimous testimony of Polydore, one of the ablest persecutors. Yet he acknowledges, that the history asserted to discuss the death of the bishop of Constantinople. Athanasius is severely exposted by Gregory (l. ii. c. 28) but Socrinus, who discovers a more liberal spirit, preserves (l. iv. c. 2) no allusion to a violent death.

CHAP.
XXI.

both sides, in the furious and obstinate seditions of the people. The commission of enforcing a sentence of banishment against Paul, had been entrusted to Hermogenes, the master-general of the cavalry; but the execution of it was fatal to himself. The catholics rose in the defence of their bishop; the palace of Hermogenes was consumed; the first military officer of the empire was dragged by the heels through the streets of Constantinople, and, after he expired, his bloody corpse was exposed to their wanton insults. The late of Hermogenes instructed Philip, the prefectus præfecti, to act with more precaution on a similar occasion. In the most gentle and honourable terms, he required the attendance of Paul in the baths of Zeuxippus, which had a private communication with the palace and the sea. A vessel which lay ready at the garden-stairs, immediately hoisted sail; and, while the people were still ignorant of the meditated sacrilege, their bishop was already embarked on his voyage to Thessalonica. They soon beheld, with surprise and indignation, the gates of the palace thrown open; and the usurper Macerianus seated by the side of the prefect on a lofty chariot, which was surrounded by troops of guards with drawn swords. The military procession advanced towards the cathedral: the urians and the catholics eagerly rushed to occupy that important post; and three thousand one hundred and fifty persons lost their lives in the confusion of the tumult. Maximianus, who was supported by a regular force, obtained a decisive victory: but his reign was disturbed by clamour and sedition; and the causes which appeared the least connected with the subject of dispute, were sufficient to nourish and to kindle the flame of civil discord. As the chapel in which the body of the great Constantine had been deposited was in a ruinous condition, the bishops transported those venerable remains into the church of St. Acacius. This prudent, and even pious measure, was represented as a wicked profanation by the whole party which adhered to the homœotican doctrine. The factions immediately flew to arms; the consecrated ground was used as their field of battle; and one of the ecclesiastical historians has observed, as a real fact, not as a figure of rhetoric, that the well before the church overflowed with a stream of blood, which filled the porticoes and the adjacent courts. The writer who should impute these tumults solely to a religious principle, would betray a very imperfect knowledge of human nature; yet it must be confessed, that the motive which misled the sincerity of zeal, and the pretence which disguised the licentiousness of passion, suppressed the remorse, which, in another cause, would have succeeded to the rage of the christians of Constantinople.*

* Ammianus (lib. xiii. c. 10.) is the only historian of this tragic event. But we no longer possess that part of his history.

* See Constantinople, l. ii. c. 2, 5-12, 15-17, 19-25, 27-32, and Maximian, l. vi. c. 4-7, 9, 10, 11, 12. The act of St. Paul of Constantinople, of which I mention two copies as genuine (Act. Eccles. p. 1417-1430), are an independent copy of those preserved by a modern Greek, who could spare the loss of a text without adding fiction and invention, is entitled to some consideration.

CHAP.
XXI.

Country
of the emperor.

The cruel and arbitrary disposition of Constantine, which did not always require the provocations of guilt and resistance, was justly exasperated by the tumults of his capital, and the criminal behaviour of a faction, which opposed the authority and religion of their sovereign. The ordinary punishments of death, exile, and confiscation were inflicted with partial rigour; and the Greeks still revere the holy memory of two clerks, a reader and a sub-deacon, who were accused of the murder of Hermogenes, and beheaded at the gates of Constantinople. By an edict of Constantine against the catholics, which has not been judged worthy of a place in the Theodosian code, those who refused to communicate with the arian bishops, and particularly with Macedonius, were deprived of the immunities of ecclesiastics, and of the rights of citizens; they were compelled to relinquish the possession of the churches, and were strictly prohibited from holding their assemblies within the walls of the city. The execution of this unjust law, in the provinces of Thrace and Asia Minor, was committed to the zeal of Macedonius: the civil and military powers were directed to obey his commands; and the cruelties exercised by this semi-arian tyrant in the support of the homoiousion, exceeded the commission, and disgraced the reign of Constantine. The sacraments of the church were administered to the reluctant victims, who denied the vocation, and abhorred the principles of Macedonius. The rites of baptism were conferred on women and children, who, for that purpose, had been torn from the arms of their friends and parents; the mouths of the communicants were held open, by a wooden engine, while the consecrated bread was forced down their throat; the breasts of tender virgins were either burnt with red-hot egg-shells, or inhumanly compressed between sharp and heavy boards.* The novations of Constantinople, and the adjacent country, by their firm attachment to the homocousins standard, deserved to be confounded with the catholics themselves. Macedonius was informed, that a large district of Paphlagonia† was almost entirely inhabited by these sectaries. He resolved either to convert or to exterminate them; and as he distrusted, on this occasion, the efficacy of an ecclesiastical mission, he commanded a body of four thousand legionaries to march against the rebels, and to reduce the territory of Mastiniana under his spiritual dominion. The novation peasants, animated by despair and religious fury, boldly encountered the invaders of their country; and though many of the Paphlagonians were slain, the Roman legions were vanquished by an irregular multitude, arm-

* Gregorius, l. 7, c. 47, 28. Socrus, l. 14, c. 21. The principal assistants of Macarius, in the work of persecution, were the two bishops of Nicomedia and Olympe, who were imposed by their flock, less especially on their pliancy. I cannot but be reminded the saying, that the difference between the lioness and the lamb, is almost insensible to the most prejudicial eye.

† We are ignorant of the precise situation of Mastiniana. In speaking of these first kinds of legislation, Socrus, Socrus, and the author of the acts of St. Paul, use the barbarous terms of apostata, persecutors, while Gregorius very properly translates them novations. Valer. ad Socrus, l. 14, c. 20.

CHAP. ed only with scythes and axes; and, except a XXI. few who escaped by an ignominious flight, four thousand soldiers were left dead on the field of battle. The successor of Constantius has expressed, in a rumour but lively manner, some of the theological calamities which afflicted the empire, and more especially the East, in the reign of a prince who was the slave of his own passions, and of those of his counsellors. "Many were imprisoned,
"and persecuted, and driven into exile. Whole "troops of those who were styled heretics were "massacred, particularly at Cyzicus, and at Sa-"monta. In Paphlagonia, Bithynia, Galatia, and "in many other provinces, towns and villages
"were laid waste, and utterly destroyed."

The result and fury
of the do-natist controversy.

Book,
to the 245, &c.

While the flames of the arian controversy consumed the vitals of the empire, the African provinces were infested by their peculiar enemies the savage fanatics, who, under the name of circumcellions, formed the strength and scandal of the donatist party.¹ The severe execution of the laws of Constantius had excited a spirit of discontent and resistance; the strenuous efforts of his son Constant, to restore the unity of the church, exasperated the sentiments of mutual hatred, which had first occasioned the separation; and the

¹ Julian Epistol. li. p. 256, 182. Apollonius.

² See Optatus Milevitanus (Constantius li. c. 1.) with the Annals History, by M. Dupin, and the original piece at the end of his edition. The numerous circumstances which Augustin has mentioned, of the fury of the circumcellions against cities, and against Christians, have been judiciously collected by Tillemont, Mém. Constant. vi. p. 142, 143; and he has added, though without design, exposed the injustice which had produced these fanatics.

methods of force and corruption employed by the two imperial commissioners, Paul and Mercurius, furnished the schismatics with a specious contrast between the maxims of the apostles and the conduct of their pretended successors. The peasants who inhabited the villages of Numidia and Mauritania, were a ferocious race, who had been imperfectly reduced under the authority of the Roman laws; who were imperfectly converted to the christian faith; but who were actuated by a blind and furious enthusiasm in the cause of their doubtful teachers. They indignantly supported the exile of their bishops, the dissolution of their churches, and the interruption of their secret assemblies. The violence of the officers of justice, who were usually sustained by a military guard, was sometimes repelled with equal violence; and the blood of some popular ecclesiastics, which had been shed in the quarrel, inflamed their rude followers with an insatiable desire of revenge on the death of their holy martyrs. By their own cruelty and abuse, the ministers of persecution sometimes provoked their fate; and the guilt of an accidental tumult precipitated the criminals into despair and rebellion. Driven from their native villages, the donatist peasants assembled in formidable gangs on the edge of the Getulian desert, and readily exchanged the labours of labour for a life of idleness and rapine, which was consecrated by the name of religion, and faintly condemned by the doctors of the sect. The leaders of the circumcellions assumed the title of captains of the saints: their principal weapon, as they were indifferently provided with swords and spears, was a huge and weighty club, which they termed an Irmelle: and the well-known sound of "penite be to God," which they used as their cry of war, diffused consternation over the terrified provinces of Africa. At first their depredations were coloured by the plea of necessity; but they soon exceeded the measure of subsistence, indulged without controul their intemperance and avarice, burnt the villages which they had pillaged, and reigned the licentious tyrants of the open country. The occupations of husbandry, and the administration of justice, were interrupted; and as the circumcellions pretended to restore the primitive equality of mankind, and to reform the abuses of civil society, they opened a secure asylum for the slaves and debtors, who flocked in crowds to their holy standard. When they were not resisted, they usually contented themselves with plunder, but the slightest opposition provoked them to acts of violence and murder; and some catholic priests, who had imprudently signalized their zeal, were tortured by the fanatics with the most refined and wanton barbarity. The spirit of the circumcellions was not always exerted against their defenceless enemies; they engaged, and sometimes defeated, the troops of the province; and in the bloody action of Bagai, they attacked in the open field, but with unsuccessful valour, an advanced guard of the imperial cavalry. The donatists who were taken in arms, received, and they soon deserved, the same treatment which might have been shewn to the wild beasts of the desert. The captives died, without a murmur, either by the sword, the axe, or the fire; and the measures of retaliation were multiplied in a rapid proportion, which aggravated the horrors of rebellion, and excluded the hope of mutual forgiveness. In the beginning of the present century, the example of the circumcellions has been renewed in the persecution, the boldness, the crimes, and the enthusiasm of the camisards; and if the fanatics of Languedoc surpassed those of Numidia, by their military achievements, the Africans maintained their fierce independence with more resolution and perseverance.*

[illegible]

Such disorders are the natural effects of religious tyranny; but the rage of the donatists was inflamed by a frenzy of a very extraordinary kind;

* The History of Camisards, in 2 vol. 1766. Valdesmarie, 1768, may be recommended as accurate and impartial. It requires some attention to discover the religion of the author.

CHAP.
XXI.

and which, if it really prevailed among them in so extravagant a degree, cannot surely be paralleled in any country, or in any age. Many of these fanatics were possessed with the horror of life, and the desire of martyrdom; and they deemed it of little moment by what means, or by what hands, they perished, if their conduct was sanctified by the intention of devoting themselves to the glory of the true faith, and the hope of eternal happiness.* Sometimes they rudely disturbed the festivals, and profaned the temples of paganism, with the design of exciting the most zealous of the idolaters to revenge the insulted honour of their gods. They sometimes forced their way into the courts of justice, and compelled the affrighted judge to give orders for their immediate execution. They frequently stopped travellers on the public highways, and obliged them to suffer the stroke of martyrdom, by the promise of a reward, if they consented, and by the threat of instant death, if they refused to grant so very singular a favour. When they were disappointed of every other resource, they announced the day on which, in the presence of their friends and brethren, they should cast themselves headlong from some lofty rock; and many precipices were shewn, which had acquired fame by the number of religious suicides. In the actions of these desperate enthusiasts, who were admired by one party as the martyrs of God, and abhorred by the other as the victims of Satan, an imperial philosopher may discover the influence and the last abuse of that inflexible spirit, which was originally derived from the character and principles of the Jewish nation.

* The same error is alleged as the justification of the execution of St. John, which is related in the VIII. chapter of the second book of the Maccabees.

The simple narrative of the intestine divisions, which distracted the peace, and dishonoured the triumph, of the church, will confirm the remark of a pagan historian, and justify the complaint of a venerable bishop. The experience of Ammianus had convinced him, that the enmity of the christians towards each other surpassed the fury of savage beasts against man;^{*} and Gregory Nazianzen most pathetically laments, that the kingdom of heaven was converted, by discord, into the image of chaos, of a nocturnal tempest, and of hell itself.[†] The fierce and partial writers of the times, ascribing all virtue to themselves, and imputing all guilt to their adversaries, have painted the battles of the angels and demons. Our calmer reason will reject such pure and perfect monsters of vice or sanctity, and will impute an equal, or at least an indiscriminate, measure of good and evil to the hostile sectaries, who assumed and bestowed the appellations of orthodox and heretics. They had been educated in the same religion, and the same civil society. Their hopes and fears in the present, or in a future life, were balanced in the same proportion. On either side, the error might be in-

* Nullius inquam beneficii sumus, ut nec ulla facies proque christianorum experies. Ammian. xiii. 4.

† Gregor. Nazianzen, Opus. i. p. 32. See Tillamont, cont. vi. p. 301, quarto edit.

CHAPTER
XXI

nascent, the faith sincere, the practice meritorious or corrupt. Their passions were excited by similar objects; and they might alternately abuse the favour of the court, or of the people. The metaphysical opinions of the athanasians and the arians could not influence their moral character; and they were alike actuated by the intolerant spirit, which has been extracted from the pure and simple maxims of the gospel.

1890

A modern writer, who, with a just confidence, has prefixed to his own history the honourable epithets of political and philosophical,³ accuses the timid prudence of Montesquieu, for neglecting to enumerate, among the causes of the decline of the empire, a law of Constantine, by which the exercise of the pagan worship was absolutely repressed, and a considerable part of his subjects was left destitute of priests, of temples, and of any public religion. The zeal of the philosophic historian for the rights of mankind has induced him to acquiesce in the ambiguous testimony of those ecclesiastics, who have too lightly ascribed to their favourite hero the merit of a general persecution.⁴ Instead of alleging this imaginary

* Éléments Psychiques et Philosophiques des Élémentsaires, les Éléments dans les deux Tomes, tome 1, p. 11.

* According to Random On Va. Constitution, p. 14, 15, the authors proposed, both in England and the United States, to present a "Political Science" the manuscript was in parts of history. Between 1845 and 1871 and November 25, 1871, it has represented the content of Constitution with a just regard to truth and history; which has been neglected by Theodore (1871, p. 11), and Wilson (1914, 1915). This double page the latter present Constitution, just as it is in the present version of the Constitution, with a just regard to truth and history, and a just regard to the Constitution.

law, which would have blazed in the front of the imperial codes, we may safely appeal to the original epistle, which Constantine addressed to the followers of the ancient religion, at a time when he no longer disguised his conversion, nor dreaded the rivals of his throne. He invites and exhorts, in the most pressing terms, the subjects of the Roman empire to imitate the example of their master; but he declares, that those who still refuse to open their eyes to the celestial light, may freely enjoy their temples, and their fancied gods. A report, that the ceremonies of paganism were suppressed, is formally contradicted by the emperor himself, who wisely assigns, as the principle of his moderation, the invincible force of habit, of prejudice, and of superstition.* Without violating the sanctity of his promise, without alarming the fears of the pagans, the artful monarch advanced, by slow and cautious steps, to undermine the irregular and decaying fabric of polytheism. The partial acts of severity which he occasionally exercised, though they were secretly prompted by a christian zeal, were coloured by the fairest pretences of justice and the public good: and while Constantine designed to ruin the foundations, he seemed to reform the abuses, of the ancient religion. After the example

CHAP.

XII.

by Constantine.

* See Eusebius in Vita Constantini l. iii. c. 33, 35. In the address to the assembly of bishops, which the emperor pronounced when he was seated in purple and party, he declares to the bishops in v. 7 that they are permitted to suffer sacrifices, and to assemble every part of their religious worship.

CHAP.
XXI

of the wisest of his predecessors, he condemned, under the most rigorous penalties, the occult and impious arts of divination; which excited the vain hopes, and sometimes the criminal attempts, of those who were discontented with their present condition. An ignominious silence was imposed on the oracles, which had been publicly convicted of fraud and falsehood; the effeminate priests of the Nile were abolished; and Constantine discharged the duties of a Roman censor, when he gave orders for the dissolution of several temples of Phœnicia, in which every mode of prostitution was devoutly practised in the face of day, and to the honour of Venus.* The imperial city of Constantinople was, in some measure, raised at the expence, and was adorned with the spoils, of the opulent temples of Greece and Asia; the sacred property was confiscated; the statues of gods and heroes were transported, with rude familiarity, among a people who considered them as objects, not of adoration, but of curiosity; the gold and silver were restored to circulation; and the magistrates, the bishops, and the curia, improved the fortunate occasion of gratifying, at once, their zeal, their avarice, and their resentment. But these depredations were confined to a small part of the Roman world, and the provinces had been long since accustomed to endure the same sacrilegious rapine, from the tyranny of princes and proconsuls, who could not be suspected of any design to subvert the established religion.¹

* See Fasti, by V. Grutier, t. II, p. 53-56, and t. IV, p. 11-13. These acts of severity may be compared with the suppression of the hieroglyphs, and the dissolution of the temple of Isis, by the magistrates of pagan Rome.

The sons of Constantine trod in the footsteps^{and his} of their father, with more zeal, and with less discretion. The pretences of rapine and oppression were insensibly multiplied;² every indulgence was shewn to the illegal behaviour of the christians; every doubt was explained to the disadvantage of paganism; and the demolition of the temples was celebrated as one of the auspicious events of the reign of Constant and Constantine.³ The name of Constantine is prefixed to a concise law, which might have superseded the necessity of any future prohibitions. "It is our pleasure, that in all places, and in all cities, the temples be immediately shut, and carefully guarded, that none may have the power of offending. It is likewise our pleasure, that all

¹ Epistola de Vita Constanti l. III. c. 34, and Liber de Donato Templo, p. 8. 10, edit. Gualtero, both mention the great sacrilege of Constantine, which they viewed in very different lights. The latter expressly declares, that "he made use of the sacred vessels, but made no alteration in the least worship; the temples he indeed were impoverished, but the sacred rites were performed as usual." Lectures on Jewish and Heathen Theology, vol. II. p. 118.

² Ammonius tract. 41, speaks of some great priests who were expelled ex officio just. Liberius says (Dei pro Templo, p. 118, that the emperor often gave away a temple, like a dog, or a horse, or a dove, or a gold ring; but the distant philosopher takes care to declare, that these sacrilegious practices were never proposed.

³ See Constantin Conf. Theodoret, tom. vi. p. 101. Letter from Paterius &c. in Patric Nihil Grati, tom. vii. p. 255.

bloody edict, Constantine visited the temples of Rome; and the decency of his behaviour is recommended by a pagan orator as an example worthy of the imitation of succeeding princes. "That emperor," says Symmachius, "suffered the privileges of the vestal virgins to remain inviolate; he bestowed the sacerdotal dignities on the nobles of Rome, granted the customary allowance to defray the expences of the public rites and sacrifices: and, though he had embraced a different religion, he never attempted to deprive the empire of the sacred worship of antiquity."¹ The senate still presumed to consecrate, by solemn decrees, the divine memory of these sovereigns; and Constantine himself was associated, after his death, to those gods whom he had renounced and insulted during his life. The title, the ensigns, the prerogatives, of SOVEREIGN PONTIFF, which had been instituted by Numa, and assumed by Augustus, were accepted, without hesitation, by seven christian emperors; who were invested with a more absolute authority over the religion which they had deserted, than over that which they professed.²

¹ Symmachus Epistol. i. 54.

² The fourth Dissertation of M. de la Bèze, sur la Souveraineté Pontificale des Empereurs Romains (in the Mém. de l'Acad. tom. vi, p. 115-118), is a very learned and judicious performance, which explains the state, and proves the subsistence, of paganism from Constantine the Great. The assertion of Zosimus, that Gratian was the first who renounced the pontifical title, is confirmed beyond a doubt; and the murmurs of ingenuity, on that subject, are almost silenced.

The divisions of christianity suspended the ruin of paganism;^a and the holy war against the infidels was less vigorously prosecuted by princes and bishops, who were more immediately alarmed by the guilt and danger of domestic rebellion. The extirpation of *idolatry might have been ^a As I have copiously anticipated the use of pagan and paganism, I shall now trace the singular revolutions of these celebrated words. 1. Paga, in the Doric dialect, as familiar to the Italians, signifies a bounding and the rural neighbourhood which frequented the same fountain, derived the compound appellation of pagus and paganus (Festus sab. voc., and Servius ad Virgil. Georgicis li. 384). 2. By an easy extension of the word, pagus and rural became almost synonymous (Plin. Hist. Natur. xviii. 31; and the meaning readily acquired that sense, which has been corrupted into peasant by the modern languages of Europe. 3. The amazing increase of the military order introduced the necessity of a consularium arm (Hume's Essays, vol. I. p. 535); and all the people who were not enlisted in the service of the prince were branded with the contemptuous epithets of pagani (Cicero Phil. ii. 24, 42, 57. Juvenal Satir. xvi. Tertullian de Pallio, c. 4). 4. The Christians were the soldiers of Christ; their adversaries, who refused his sacrament, or military oath of baptism, might deserve the metaphorical name of pagani; and this popular reproach was introduced as early as the reign of Valentinian (A. D. 365) into imperial laws (Cod. Theodos. l. xvi. tit. ii. leg. 18) and theological writings. 5. Christianity gradually filled the cities of the empire; the old religion, in the time of Proculus (others, Symmachus, l. i. ad Sen. and Orosius in Præfat. Hist.) retired and languished in remote villages; and the word pagani, with its new signification, reverted to its primitive origin. 6. Since the worship of Jupiter and his family had expired, the vacant title of pagani has been successively applied to all the idolaters and polytheists of the old and new world. 7. The Latin christians borrowed idolatriam gentilium, on their mortal enemies the mahometans; and the pagan worshippers were branded with the unjust reproach of idolatry and paganism. See Gerard Vossius Etymologiae Linguae Latine, in his works, tom. I. p. 420. Godfrey's Commentary on the Theodosian Code, tom. vi. p. 234, and Duranget, glossæ & indices Latini, tom. II. tom.

* In the pure language of Asia and Athens, Idolatry and Idol were ancient and familiar words. The former expressed a doctrine, justified by the established principles of intolerance: but the hostile sects, which alternately reigned in the imperial court, were mutually apprehensive of alienating, and perhaps exasperating, the minds of a powerful, though declining, faction. Every motive of authority and fashion, of interest and reason, now militated on the side of christianity; but two or three generations elapsed, before their victorious influence was universally felt. The religion which had so long and so lately been established in the Roman empire was still revered by a numerous people, less attached indeed to speculative opinion, than to ancient custom. The honours of the state and army were indifferently bestowed on all the subjects of Constantine and Constantius; and a considerable portion of knowledge and wealth and valour was still engaged in the service of polytheism. The superstition of the senator and of the peasant, of the poet and the philosopher, was derived from very different causes; but they met with equal devotion in the temples of the gods. Their zeal was insensibly provoked by the insulting triumph of a pro-

an apostrophe (Homer. Odyss. vi, 601) a representation, an image, created either by fancy or art. The latter denoted any sort of animal or slavery. The Isis of Egypt, who introduced the Hebrew scriptures, contained the use of these words (Exod. xx, 4, 5) as the religious worship of an image. The peculiar adoration of the Idolatry, or Gilded Jew, has been adopted by the sacred and profane writers, and the reproach of idolatry (Idolatry) has signified the visible and object made of superstition, which were sets of superstition should not easily impress in the polytheism of Greece and Rome.

CHAP. scribed sect; and their hopes were revived by XXI. the well-grounded confidence, that the presumptive heir of the empire, a young and valiant hero, who had delivered Gaul from the arms of the barbarians, had secretly embraced the religion of his ancestors.

END OF THE THIRD VOLUME.

(29)

—
 Macmillan, Deane, and Stevenson, printers, Edinburgh.

CATALOGUED

W.C.

"A book that is shut is but a block"

CENTRAL ARCHAEOLOGICAL LIBRARY

GOVT. OF INDIA
Department of Archaeology
NEW DELHI

Please help us to keep the book clean and moving.